PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS
FOURTH SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 29, 1922.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, December 27, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Ernst	Lenroot	Phipps
Bayard	Fernald	Lodge	Poindexter
Borah	Fletcher	McCormick	Pomerene
Brandegee	Gerry	McCumber	Reed, Mo.
Brookhart	Hale	McKellar	Sheppard
Broussard	Harris	McKinley	Shortridge
Bursum	Heflin	McLean	Smoot
Calder	Hitchcock	McNary	Spencer
Cameron	Johnson	Moses	Stanfield
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Sterling
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	New	Sutherland
Colt	Kellogg	Nicholson	Townsend
Culberson	Kendrick	Norbeck	Trammell
Cummins	Keyes	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	King	Oddie	Warren
Dial	Ladd	Page	Watson
Dillingham	La Follette	Pepper	Weller

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is necessarily detained because of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PEPPER presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 12237) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. KENDRICK presented the petition of John D. Phillips and sundry other members of the Parent-Teachers' Association of Upton, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Casper (Wyo.) Chamber of Commerce, protesting against the adoption of the Budget recommendation to appropriate only $3,000,000 for carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act pertaining to forest roads and trails, and urging the appropriation of $6,500,000 as authorized by law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FOODSTUFFS AND RAW MATERIALS FOR GERMANY.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to provide credit to Germany for the purpose of purchasing foodstuffs and raw materials in this country. It is evident that the serious problem with our farmers to-day is to market at living prices their surplus products. I am in hopes that this bill will be found to be drawn along serviceable and sound lines. I ask its reference to the Finance Committee.

The bill (S. 4243) to stimulate trade by providing credit to enable Germany to purchase foodstuffs and raw materials in the United States, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4244) for the relief of the Ogden Chamber of Commerce; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4245) to provide the necessary organization of the customs service for an adequate administration and enforcement of the tariff act of 1922, and all other customs revenue laws; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 4246) granting the consent of Congress to the city of St. Paul, Minn., and the county of Ramsey, Minn., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the point where Robert Street, in said city of St. Paul, crosses the Mississippi River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 4247) granting a pension to Mertie M. Turner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4248) to fix the compensation of employees in post offices for overtime services performed in excess of eight hours daily; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13559, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 99, line 13, strike out "$35,000, including" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$73,000, including not exceeding $38,000 for completing the widening of the Nisqually Glacier to Paradise Valley Road,".

On page 99, line 17, strike out "$95,000" and insert "$133,000."

On page 100, line 6, strike out "$11,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$61,000." Also on page 100, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "; in all, $74,280" and insert the words ", including not exceeding $50,000 for construction and improvement of roads; in all, $124,280."

On page 101, line 25, strike out "$70,000" and insert "$120,000," and on page 102, line 3, strike out "; in all, $295,000" and insert ", including not exceeding $50,000 for construction and improvement of roads; in all, $345,000."

CLAIM OF CHARLES PARIDY ET AL.

Mr. McKINLEY (by request) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 387), which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Whereas the Government, through its Department of War, during the late war with Germany purchased and used several thousand caterpillar war tanks and tractors; and

Whereas the war tanks and tractors named in the preceding paragraph have been charged to be an infringement upon Charles Paridy's United States Letters Patent No. 1047281 in a suit against the Government, filed October 27, 1920 (and still pending), in the Court of Claims, and entitled as follows:

Charles Paridy, Anna McLatchie, and Ferdinand Lother, claimants, v. the United States. No. 34716.

In which suit the patentee, Charles Paridy, together with his assignees of part interest, Anna McLatchie and Ferdinand Lother, claims damages in the sum of $10,000,000 for the use of said patented war tanks and tractors by the Government; and

Whereas the patentee's original petition in said Court of Claims suit contains sworn statements that, according to the reports of the Director of Finance and Auditor of the War Department, there was at the time of filing said suit (October 27, 1920) in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States the sum of $100,000,000 with which to pay the cost of said patented war tanks and tractors; and

Whereas not a single cent has yet been paid to said patentee, Charles Paridy, or to his said assignees in part, Anna McLatchie and Ferdinand Lother, by the Government as license fees, royalties, or as damages for the use of said war tanks and tractors, notwithstanding the fact, as shown by said suit now pending in the Court of Claims, that the said patentee and his assignees in part filed said suit and therein claimed $10,000,000 in damages over two years ago; and

Whereas the said claimants, Charles Paridy, Anna McLatchie, and Ferdinand Lother, have agreed, and do hereby agree, to reduce the amount of their claim 50 per cent, from $10,000,000 to $5,000,000, upon the passage of this resolution and the immediate payment to them of said reduced amount by order of the War Department out of money that has already been appropriated and now being held subject to the orders of the War Department, ready to be disbursed, in payment for war supplies, but with the proviso that in case there is not sufficient money thus available to forthwith pay said claimants the said sum of $5,000,000, then claimants' offer to reduce their claim 50 per cent, as above recited, may be forthwith withdrawn and claimants will be at liberty to prosecute the said suit in the Court of Claims for the full amount of their claim, to wit, $10,000,000; and said suit shall be given precedence over all other suits filed subsequently and shall be speedily prepared for trial and be tried and decided at the earliest possible date on account of its long pendency before the Court of Claims: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Director of Finance and Auditor of the War Department be, and hereby is, requested to settle the claim now pending in the Court of Claims, suit No. 34716, as above recited, for the sum of $5,000,000, and to pay said sum to the claimants, Charles Paridy, Anna McLatchie, and Ferdinand Lother, forthwith out of War Department funds already appropriated; and upon such payment the said claimants' said suit shall be forthwith dismissed and no further claim shall thereafter be made against the United States for any infringement of the said Paridy Letters Patent No. 1047281 by any owner of any interest therein: Provided, That if sufficient money to pay said amount is not already appropriated, and the amount can not be paid out of funds now subject to the orders of the War Department, then the said claimants may prosecute their said pending suit in the Court of Claims for the full amount of $10,000,000 against the United States, the same as if the said offer of settlement at 50 per cent reduction had not been made, and said suit shall be speedily prepared for trial and be tried and decided at the earliest possible date on account of its long pendency before said court.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3295) to consolidate the work of collecting, compiling, and publishing statistics of the foreign commerce of the United States in the Department of Commerce, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PROPERTY REPORT OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS (S. DOC. NO. 279).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, transmitting pursuant to law a complete account of all property in his possession and in the Senate Office Building belonging to the United States Senate on December 4, 1922, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, out of the long contest over the foreign policy of our Government there developed three distinct viewpoints evidenced by groups in this Chamber and by the larger groups without. There were those who believed that from the Great War had come an obligation for the United States to become substantially a part of a world concert under definite rules and agreements, such as were prescribed in the covenant of the League of Nations. This group would have unhesitatingly taken us into the league without amendment of its provisions and would gladly had us unite with other nations under its terms without modification or alteration.

A second group, while believing our ultimate purpose should be that proclaimed by the first, insisted that prudence dictated our future be protected by reservations or amendments from the possibilities of some of the conditions of the league.

And yet a third group, while wishing that our country should be both generous and unselfish in dealing with other nations, believed that the high purpose of the Republic could be fulfilled and its ultimate destiny realized only by continuing its age-old policies, under which the Nation has grown great and powerful, rich and happy.

The divergent views were finally carried directly to the people, and whatever may be said by those who had desired us to become a part of the international compact, the fact remains that we did not enter the league and that our people overwhelmingly repudiated it.

The contest did not stop, however, with 1920, nor with the final action in this Chamber. The propaganda has been continuous and increasing to drive this country into some sort of international pact, to discredit the action of the Senate in refusing to enter the league, and every art of subtle publicity has been utilized in the effort to reverse the decision of the American people and to destroy those who officially have been a part of that decision.

I am against the Borah amendment. I am against it for precisely the reasons I was against taking the United States into the League of Nations. I am against it because, in my opinion, it will do exactly what thus far we have declined to do. I am against it because in even greater degree, and with less safeguards than the League of Nations gave to us, it will embroil us in European controversies and finally make the United States, after a hundred and fifty years, a part of the European system. I am against the amendment as it is presented, and, just as in the former contest, of which it is, in my judgment, but a continuation, I am against it with either reservations or amendments. I have been unable to conceive any amendment or reservation which, leaving the design, would avert the possible injurious consequences.

During the war we were fascinated by phrases. The wizardy of words still holds some of our people enthralled. The facile pen or eloquent tongue can paint the picture of the suffering and the woe and the anguish of the world, and in burning sentences demand that in some nebulous, uncertain, and undisclosed fashion we should at all hazards rescue our brethren at the uttermost ends of the earth from their trials, their tribulations, and their sufferings. The idealistic appeal strikes an answering and sympathetic chord in every human breast. The hope and the aspiration of aiding humanity were not born in many of us merely with the war and can never be forgotten, even though we decline to pursue a much-heralded but demonstrated fallacy presented by those who arrogate to themselves all the world's idealism and sympathy. This hope and this aspiration are not attributes alone of a few superior beings, who demand, upon pain of their denial of altruism and idealism to the rest of us, that we follow any course they may mark. We decline to enter into Europe's maelstrom without definite and cogent reasons upon the mere arrogation of a superior charity, benevolence, and altruism by those who would take us in, or because of denunciation of those who will not blindly accept and follow any suggested course. I do not ascribe this attitude to any man in this Chamber. It is, however, the distinct attitude of many of the advocates of this amendment without this Chamber.

Just what is it that is asked by the amendment? It provides for a conference—which shall be charged with the duty of considering the economic problems now obtaining throughout the world with a view of arriving at such understandings or arrangements as may seem essential to the restoration of trade and to the establishment of sound financial and business conditions.

I am dealing now only with the first part of the amendment. On some future occasion I intend to refer to the latter part. Obviously, the amendment provides for the consideration of every world economic problem. Not only does it provide for the consideration of every world economic problem but it distinctly directs that "understandings and arrangements" shall be arrived at. Understandings and arrangements by whom? The United States calls the conference. It sits with those who attend. Of necessity, in conjunction with those invited, it must arrive at understandings and arrangements affecting every world problem. It would be unspeakable to call this conference, and when called, to stand aside and refuse to have aught to do with it. It would be worse to call this conference and arrive at understandings and arrangements, and then refuse to do our part and let those understandings and arrangements be carried out by others. If we meet with the other nations of the earth to consider their world problems, calling upon them with us to reach the solution, and a solution be reached, we must bear our part subsequently in carrying out that solution. We must do our share in executing the understandings and agreements arrived at. In good faith, there can be no escape from this conclusion.

What problems are to be considered by this conference? The language of the amendment includes all, and I am well within the fact when I say that the economic problems of the world are inextricably commingled to-day with its political problems. It is an utter and absolute impossibility to arrive at a definite solution of the economic problems of the world without solving at the same time some of its political ills. Let us make no mistake, therefore, about what this amendment means according to its terms. It means that every ill from which Europe now is suffering, every problem there existing, every dismal situation, every wrong and injustice shall be brought to the city of Washington at our request, at our instance, and upon our invitation, for solution, and that we undertake thereafter, because we are the leaders in the movement, whatever is essential to rewrite Europe's present story. If the language of the amendment does not mean exactly this thing, it can mean nothing at all. I have not heard its advocates here and I have not read its newspaper advocates outside this Chamber designate what they expect to be accomplished by the conference nor indicate the specific economic subjects with which it will deal.

Mr. President, I prefer a League of Nations with some rules of procedure, with the members bound by some preliminary agreement, to this general omnibus endeavor which has neither limitations nor specifications.

As I understand the argument here, two reasons are advanced for the adoption of the amendment and for our immediate participation in the difficulties of Europe. The first, and apparently that most vigorously insisted upon, is that we are already in Europe; that because we have some troops on the Rhine and some observers or representatives at the various conferences being held abroad we are at present actually in Europe, and, therefore, we but continue what already is an accomplished fact.

That we are thus now in Europe is deplored. Indeed, apparently in both the instances cited, it is earnestly and emphatically asserted we ought not to be there. Demand is made for the return of the American soldiers, and that those representing America at the European conferences cease their activities. I quarrel with neither demand. But the logic of the position assumed seems to be that inasmuch as we commit a little wrong, we will cure it by a greater. The vice of the argument is not only in its illogic but in its erroneous assumption. The United States is not officially in Europe. Those there do not and can not bind this country either morally or legally to any particular course.

I have no apologies to make for the maintenance of our troops upon the Rhine. I care not whether France wishes them or Germany begs them to remain. They should be brought home. I know little of what Mr. Boyden does at meetings of the Reparation Commission. I do know he can not bind the United States, and I doubt very much if he projects this country into activities that are none of our concern. Be that as it may, however, is it intended, because these things exist, actually now to make us a part of the Reparation Commission? I can not otherwise see the conclusion of what is here suggested than that we, the United States, must become a part of the Reparation Commission, and as a part of this, the most important and most repulsive element of the Versailles treaty, enforce its terms either as written, or to be modified in some undisclosed fashion by conference.

What is it that retards Germany's recovery and incidentally the recovery of Europe? In answer I need not quote the world's statesmen nor even the Senator from Idaho. In a word, all understand now that it is the Versailles treaty, and in particular the reparations provisions. What then, even were we to embark upon a new foreign policy and engage with Europe, in agreements to solve Europe's ills, and execute the agreements reached, must we first deal with? Obviously, the reparation clauses of the Versailles treaty. I reecho what has been said in the last few days about our position at the making of the treaty, when America was the only nation asking and receiving neither lands nor reparations, and Americans for all time can take a just pride in our country's attitude. I do not hesitate to extend to President Wilson the fullest praise for his stand at Paris in this respect. But those who have studied the Versailles treaty, all the liberal statesmen of the world, now regret it, and especially deplore the provisions relating to reparations.

I speak of the reparations provisions so emphatically because, in the final analysis, they constitute one of the two things with which an economic conference, if real and of aid, must deal. I take it there is not a man in the United States who desires that an economic conference be called in this country or elsewhere without having that conference a real one and having it deal with the very subject matters which to-day are the cause of the conditions prevailing in Europe. So I say—and none, I think will question the accuracy of the statement—that if a conference be held which is intended to be real that conference must deal first with the reparations question and the provisions of the Versailles treaty relating to reparations.

Mr. President, to speak of aiding Europe without taking into account the treaty and these clauses is to indulge in the veriest moonshine. Remember what the Reparation Commission is. It is in essence a government possessing the attributes of sovereignty with power to issue decrees, which the German Government must put in legislative form, with quasi, if not complete, judicial power, and certainly executive power. It is a foreign body issuing its mandates from unfriendly soil. It might even require and utilize troops to enforce its decrees. It is a secret supergovernment, utterly repugnant to American conceptions and ideas. This is the brief description by an eminent authority, the Senator from Idaho. No excoriation of the Reparation Commission has equaled that of the distinguished Senator. His denunciation strikes a sympathetic chord; and as we realize exactly what the commission is, and what its powers portend, we of the Congress resolve that our country shall have no part in its activities or iniquities. But it is precisely there we are headed by the Borah amendment.

It may be said by our internationalists that we can have an economic conference, rehabilitate Europe, and have nothing to do with reparations or the Reparation Commission. What incredible egotism is this! France is to receive 52 per cent, as I recall, of the reparations to be paid. Are there any so credulous as to believe that upon the altruistic suggestion that reparations be waived or the terms of the treaty modified France will gracefully assent? We are simple in diplomacy and childlike in our faith, but none so simple or credulous as to believe that France will forego what she deems her rights without adequate guaranties. Are you ready to give these guaranties? I am not. Admittedly, reparations constitute the key to economic stability and recovery of the Central Powers. Whether their terms continue as they are or are modified, provision for their execution must be made; and if France yields to any entreaty of ours for modification, justly France may insist either that we underwrite the new terms or guarantee them, or that we become one of the members charged with their execution. Do you desire to underwrite reparations to France or any country? I do not. Let some statesman here, fired with a world resolve, tell how an economic conference can be held without one of its principal subjects being the reparation terms of the Versailles treaty. And if it be admitted this troublesome and wicked thing must be disposed of at once, you are in the realm not only of an economic conference but a most important political conference. And if because of this fact you eliminate the reparations question from your conference, you better not hold one, for at the end you will be as at the beginning, and the festering sore of Europe will be more virulent.

Just one other thing may be done to aid Europe, and this possibly in some minds is the nub of the whole matter. We might minister to Europe's needs and assist in her restoration by lending her more money. If any man in Congress dared suggest that our Government make additional loans to European Governments, the American people would quickly end his political activities. We will not, and we ought not, make any other loans to European Governments. I suspect certain gentlemen engaged in international banking hug the delusion that our Government may underwrite loans they may make; but I suggest to them that their hopes are but an iridescent dream.

Following to its logical conclusion the proposal for this conference we must choose either the alternative of arousing false hopes and doing incalculable harm or of entering upon a course far removed from what is merely financial and which may jeopardize our future, and which, if once entered upon, may make us a part of Europe's future political controversies.

The second reason advanced for this conference, broadly stated, is that if we do not intervene economically in Europe we will have to intervene in war there. I deny it. If we intervene economically—whatever that may mean—we will be in the midst of Europe's turmoil and may possibly be involved in Europe's wars. But to say that without this conference, with all that may flow from it, we will be involved in some future European war, is, I think, a bit extravagant. It will be a long, long day before European troubles will entice us to war, and I think we may dismiss the threat of war from this discussion.

The bait is held before our farmers that they will prosper if we will but confer on Europe's reconstruction; but the farmers have not been told the only reconstruction suggested involves us for generations in Europe's controversies. Aid the farmer? Not so. Aid the international banker? Yes; and the farmer will pay the price.

A great deal has been said of the distress and financial chaos of Europe. Much of it is true. Conditions in a part of Europe, however, do not sustain the doleful tale. The statistics of imports and exports of Great Britain do not indicate that Great Britain is perishing. Here are the figures:

In 1913 the monthly average imports of Great Britain were £64,000,000. In 1922 the monthly average imports up to and including September, which is the last month of record, were £80,000,000.

As to exports, the monthly average in 1913 was £44,000,000. In 1922 the monthly average up to and including September, which is the last month of record, was £59,000,000.

How about the foreign exchange of Great Britain—the pound sterling?

In September, 1920, it was 72 per cent of par in relation to the dollar; in September, 1921, it was 77 per cent of par in relation to the dollar; in September, 1922, it was 91 per cent of par in relation to the dollar.

Other countries of Europe, not war torn, present similar situations.

Take the Netherlands: The value of the guilder in percentage of par in September, 1920, was 78 per cent; in September, 1922, 97 per cent.

Take Sweden: The value of the krone in percentage of par in September, 1920, was 75 per cent; in September, 1922, it was 99 per cent.

Take Switzerland: The value of the Swiss franc in percentage of par in September, 1920, was 84 per cent; in September, 1922, it was 97 per cent.

Thus a part of Europe, at least, is recovering financial stability, and in the peoples may be found some of the moral of the present situation.

The trouble, of course, in central Europe is just as related by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCormick] yesterday. The trouble is red, is awful war—war that has left its impress that a generation and generations of generations can scarcely wipe out—war, war, awful war and destruction. Not only that, but as well the collapse of Russia contributes to the distressful conditions there; and, remember, our country will have nothing to do with Russia, and presumably Russia would not be a part of an economic conference. Lest you misunderstand me, I want you to know that I do not believe in that policy at all; but as far as officially we are concerned, Russia would be no part of an economic conference, for we have naught to do with that government. Russia, with its collapse; red war, with all that it means; and beyond that there are other reasons for conditions over there, reasons that will be found in the intimacies of the chancelleries and the ministries of Europe, too; reasons that we want to be no part of in the days to come, just as we have been no part of them in the days gone by.

Oh, Mr. President, what magic there is in the word "conference"! What talismanic characteristics it has that it makes every puzzle-headed man outside this Chamber in ecstacy at once say "A conference; oh, a conference!" All the world yields to the magic of the word. Oh, how great it is! A conference will wipe out all the devastation of war. Every ill that man is heir to will cease if we just have a conference; and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] yesterday, in beginning his exquisite little address, used a homely illustration and a very apt illustration. Conference appeals to him. Conference, of course, appeals to me, and I heard his illustration sympathetically, and I recall that he said that if two men outside are having differences, and they come and put their feet under the same table in a conference, their differences likely will be composed and all will be well.

Let us draw the analogy a little closer. Let us make it a bit more apt to what we are facing to-day.

A creditor walks down the street—a great, robust, powerful creditor. He meets a half-dozen debtors, squabbling among themselves, all in distress. He meets these half-dozen debtors, all suffering financial distress and wondering what the outcome will be, and says: "What is the matter, my friends?" They say: "We are troubled, we are financially depressed. We do not know what to do." "Ah," he says, "I have the remedy. Come to my house to-day at 2 p. m. to the moment. We will hold a conference and all your ills forthwith will be cured."

The creditor returns to his home. The six debtors come. Around the table they sit. They hold a conference; and as the creditor beams upon his debtors he says, "Now we will forever arrange every ill that is yours. We will now, all of us sitting around this table in a conference, provide every remedy that may be necessary for your future."

Then one of the debtors modestly pipes up and says: "Fine! Fine! Thank you, Mr. Creditor; thank you! Let us consider first the debts that we owe you." Then the creditor, with an austere demeanor, sternly says: "Not so! Not so! I can not permit you to discuss the debts that you owe me. That is something that I could not for an instant tolerate. We will confer upon other matters and upon the debts you owe one another." Thus he forecloses inquiry on the subject that is most important to his debtors; but he brings to them hope again, for he says: "Here we sit in conference around the table. Our legs are under the same mahogany, and in conference now all your ills shall be solved. Let us take up your debts to one another. You who owe a debt to the other sitting next to you need pay just so much, and you who are the creditor of this individual will receive only so much."

"Well," says the individual affected, "That might be all right if you will guarantee the payment."

"Oh, no; no; no"; says the creditor, "I am not guaranteeing anything here. I am holding a conference. I am not dealing with anything else; I am holding a conference, and I will not guarantee anything that shall be paid to you."

"Then underwrite, will you not," says the poor debtor in despair.

"Underwrite? Not a bit of it. My people would not tolerate for a single instant that I underwrite it."

"Then, for heaven's sake, if you reduce, guarantee the execution of the payment of the reduced amount."

"No," is the firm response, "we will not touch that. We will take up other matters. We will hold our conference and cure your ills, but not in that fashion."

Then another one pipes up, who doubtless had read the speeches made on the other side of the Chamber, and he says, "You deny us markets by your tariff bill. Destroy your tariff wall, repeal your tariff law, and you will cure us of our economic ills."

"No; you can not talk to me about that," says the creditor. "That is my own domestic concern, which I will submit to no man's arbitration, to the arbitrament of no set of men."

Then another says, "Oh, let down your immigration bars. Perhaps with some of our people leaving our country you may aid us a bit."

"Immigration bars? Who are you to say to me that immigration shall be as you desire? We determine that. Pass to another matter and let this conference be a success."

So it goes down the line with every question of import and every one of concern; and finally the conference is adjourned with the benediction and the blessing of the great creditor who called it, with the imprecations and the maledictions of every other man who attended it; and after it is all over up comes a bewhiskered gentleman scratching his head and saying, "I am a farmer. What have I gotten out of this thing?" The creditor turns upon him with severity and indignation and says, "Oh, you ungrateful wretch; you have got your conference."

And the conference has been held. The illustration of the Senator from Oregon may be carried to that sort of conclusion. Magic in conferences? How many have been held in Europe in the last year or so? Conferences have been held in all the various cities of Europe, held by those primarily concerned over there, held by those most interested in determining the reconstruction of Europe. They have been holding their conferences; and what a fatuous folly it seems for us over here to say, "What you can not do yourselves and will not do, we will do without mixing in with you at all."

Silly nonsense, is this? It is perhaps an unfortunate trait of American character which Dickens used aptly to describe, a trait of American character that sees naught else than its own creature and its own self, a trait of American character we could not impute to anyone in the Senate and which, with our experience, could never be ours.

Conferences? Conferences upon what? Economic conferences? Oh, ecstatic is the thought! Economic conferences; and yet no man has told us, no paper in its denunciation has yet unfolded, what an economic conference may be or where finally it may lead. Is there no lesson in the last few years to us? Is there nothing we have learned in the last few months from the situation in the Near East? Conferences? Remember, my Democratic brethren, the League of Nations lives—I will not say, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] said yesterday, that it languishes—but the League of Nations lives to-day, a world entity. The League of Nations lives; yet within a brief period the two most powerful members of that league—the leaders, presumably, of civilization, at least beyond the water—the two most powerful members of that league each backed a belligerent and an antagonist in the Near East and fomented a bloody war there which finally required the troops of one in an endeavor to stop the havoc which had been the fault of both those members of the league and, so far as I am aware, sir, without the league even taking cognizance of the war. The two most powerful nations in Europe, the two most influential members of the League, conferring every month—at Genoa, at Cannes, at Geneva, at Lausanne, and at every other city in Europe—the two most powerful member nations of the league fomented a bloody war, a bloody war for which they, and they alone, were responsible.

I want no part for this great Nation of ours in that kind of adventure. I want no part for the United States of America in that kind of conference, and the conclusions and understandings arrived at in that kind of conference. Because I do not, sir, I am standing here with what vigor I possess, without the eloquence of the distinguished Senator from Idaho, without his power of invective or expression, standing here, though, with every fiber of mine fighting, just as I have fought since 1917, fighting, fighting, fighting, to keep America from these mad adventures of Europe, and against jeopardizing the future of the Republic we all love.

Mr. President, the arguments which have been made upon this floor we have heard before. This is not the first time that every argument presented here has been made to us; not the first time; nor have the arguments in the past been any less eloquent than those which have been recently made here. It but adds to the fame and the glory of both that the arguments made in behalf of the League of Nations by Woodrow Wilson are substantially the same as the arguments made by the Senator from Idaho in behalf of this amendment.

In the last couple of days I have read again the speeches of Mr. Wilson in his celebrated pilgrimage throughout the country. I read them not only with interest but with profit. All of you may read them with profit; profit to yourselves, and perhaps profit to your country. I do not wish to occupy the time to-day in reading the passages, but I have marked the places in those speeches where Mr. Wilson, arguing for the League of Nations, said, in substantially the same words which have been heard upon this floor, "We must become partners with the rest of the world, or economic chaos will be ours, and possibly war may come to us." His words respecting the treaty of Versailles are very, very instructive. Names and epithets may be applied to those who differed with him then; epithets and names may be applied to those who differ now with the Senator from Idaho, but read Mr. Wilson's praises of the treaty, read his remarks concerning the reparations provisions of the treaty. He describes the treaty as a just and an American instrument. He describes it in terms extravagantly of praise. Who is there to-day in all the world, among the statesmen of all the earth, who would reecho now the sentiments expressed by Mr. Wilson regarding the treaty of Versailles? When he speaks of the reparations—and I speak by the book now, for before me it is—when he speaks of the reparations he says, "The terms are severe, but are just," and he praises the constitution of the Reparation Commission and what it may in the future do. Who is there in all the earth to-day who praises the Reparation Commission or the provisions of the Versailles treaty relating to reparations?

Oh, my friends on the other side of the Chamber, you were wrong about the Versailles treaty. Oh, my friends on the other side of the Chamber, your spokesman was wrong about the Reparation Commission and the terms of the treaty relating to reparations.

Oh, ye upon this side of the Chamber, if your views be like those of the Senator from Oregon and you think we should ratify the treaty of Versailles, remember that there is not a responsible statesman in all the world to-day but deplores the treaty, but regrets certain of its terms, and the great thing some are endeavoring to do for Europe economically is to rewrite a part of the provisions of the treaty of Versailles.

I recall these words of President Wilson in no invidious vein at all. I had the honor during the time that he crossed the continent of crossing the continent too, preaching the doctrine in which I believed and which I believe to-day, preaching that doctrine as best I could everywhere that Americans would assemble. In all that crossing of the continent I had naught, as I have naught now, to say except in praise of the President personally, although I disagreed most radically with his views.

What a pity it is that on a question like this, the question greatest that can come to the United States of America, the question, indeed, that involves the perpetuity of this great Republic itself—what a pity that it can not be argued in the United States of America without a hired press of international bankers intervening on the one side or the other. It is a pity that that is so, and that when a man speaks his heart he meets at once with every kind of vilification, denunciation, and abuse.

Remember the words that were here spoken only three short years ago about this treaty. No man on the other side, no man on this side, would repeat them to-day in eulogy of the treaty of Versailles. Remember what here is said by him in regard to the reparations and the Reparation Commission. No man in all the world, aye, even the spokesman of the administration itself, but writes the Reparation Commission to-day the rubber stamp of sinister ministries.

Remember, as you remember these things, how wrong you were then. Remember how the inexorable facts of time have proven and demonstrated you wrong, and, remembering that, be at least charitable in the view you hold of those who oppose an amendment such as this, that may be the forerunner of ills greater than any we have yet encountered.

The President yesterday, in his excellent communication to Senator LODGE, completely answered the request for the conference. I do not refer more particularly to this letter, because it speaks for itself. It is a vain and futile action, Senators, a vain and a futile action, and when, sir, with promises unfulfilled, with blighted hopes, Europe leaves the conference here, leaves it disgruntled, disappointed, and embittered, we have but intensified the tragic situation over there; and as the farmer who has been used here departs with empty hands and without relief, we have added to the discontent in this country. If, on the other hand, it be not a vain, a futile, and an idle thing, and if by the unwarranted threat of impending war we frighten this Republic into going into Europe's controversies, if we are taken from the path that has been ours ever since we have been a nation, if we are led through this measure into uncharted ways and are carried into foreign turmoil, the generations that are yet to come will hold us in obloquy for the wrong we do our common country.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not in favor of either the original provision as reported in the House text or the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I shall very briefly state my reasons. The question before the Senate naturally divides itself, I think, into two parts—the provision of the House bill which calls for a conference for disarmament or further disarmament and limitation of armaments, and the amendment of the Senator from Idaho extending the conference to economic considerations.

As to the disarmament conference which was held in Washington a year ago, I believe no other country was in a position to accomplish as much or could have accomplished as much as did the United States. It was removed from many of the controversies in Europe, from the economic difficulties and racial hatreds which rendered it impossible for those nations, without the influence of this country, to come to such an agreement. I have not the slightest doubt that, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], every effort was made to extend the limitations to auxiliary craft, such as aircraft and submarines, and to include disarmament of land forces. But as everyone knows, it was impossible to do so and it seems as though there would be no more prospect of succeeding now than at that time.

Conditions, of course, in Europe are worse than they were, but I doubt very much if they have become so bad that the European nations are willing to go further with disarmament. But it would certainly be unwise to rush into another disarmament conference until the treaties which were made at the last conference have been ratified by all the countries. If we should call another disarmament conference now, France would open up the whole subject and the treaties now pending before the French Chamber and Senate would never be ratified. Let France ratify those treaties before we start another conference.

Furthermore, the President would need to inquire of the various governments whether such a disarmament conference would be welcomed, whether it would have any prospects of success, and the President has ample authority to do this without an act of Congress. He has the authority under the Constitution to negotiate treaties and to call conferences for that purpose, and no act of Congress can limit that authority.

I do not think it is wise, therefore, at this time to adopt an amendment to the bill requesting the President to call a further disarmament conference, not that it would not be wise to have one. I think there should be a limitation of auxiliary craft. I think there should be a limitation of the great land forces that bear so heavily in taxes to-day upon the nations of Europe. But there seems to be no prospect that the President could, by calling a conference now before the other treaties have been ratified, accomplish such a purpose. I think the provision in the House bill is unwise.

The proposed economic conference assumes an entirely different aspect and should be considered from a different angle. I am not in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, but I do not place my opposition upon the ground that we should have nothing to do with the economic questions in Europe or that we can escape the effect of a financial breakdown and chaos in European countries. I agree with very much that was said by the Senator from Idaho, but I can not bring myself to believe that it is wise for the Congress to request the President to call an economic conference until he has some knowledge of the willingness of Europe to take steps to really remedy the conditions. Nor do I believe that it is possible for us to escape the effect of a breakdown in Europe or Europe's condition. The social and political influence of such a condition on our trade and commerce is so far-reaching that no one can say, in my opinion, that we can ignore this condition. But is Europe ready for it? Have the governments of Europe made up their minds to stop the ruinous inflation and governmental extravagance, to realize that their governments are bankrupt and to take drastic measures to place them upon a firm, substantial basis where the people can live and prosecute industry? In my judgment, there is no present indication that they are ready. However, I can but believe that many of the countries of Europe are fast approaching a condition of financial breakdown and perhaps political chaos, and that at some time not far distant there must be such an economic conference and drastic remedies applied.

I am not going to burden the Senate with a review of the financial condition of the various governments of Europe, but it may be instructive for those who have not studied the details of the conditions of the various countries to consider for a moment the condition of France.

The total debt of France to-day is 267,000,000,000 francs, or reduced to dollars in equivalent par exchange $53,000,000,000, for a nation of 40,000,000 people. The total interest charge on the domestic debt of France, excluding her foreign debt to this country, is 12,000,000,000 francs per annum, or reduced to dollars at par exchange $2,500,000,000 a year, which if paid in dollars would nearly equal our entire Government expense.

The foreign debt of France is 35,000,000,000 francs. That must be paid in exchange at par in gold. It amounts to $7,000,000,000. The foreign debt adjusted to the average market rate as of January 3, 1923, equals 85,000,000,000 francs instead of 35,000,000,000 francs. This would make the total debt in French currency 317,000,000,000 francs.

The interest charge on the internal debt in 1922 in France equals about 51 per cent of the total annual budget of the nation. At the rate France is increasing her obligations by issuing short-time notes it is estimated that in 1928 her interest charge alone for domestic debts will equal 76 per cent of her budget of 35,000,000,000 francs, or approximately 24,000,000,000 francs, which would be the interest on her domestic debt.

France has spent 90,000,000,000 francs in the restoration of the devastated region for which she was to receive reparation from Germany, and she has received about $550,000,000 in cash, armistice deliveries, coal, and permanent properties in Alsace and Lorraine, of which only about $35,000,000 was in cash upon reparations. It is estimated that only two-thirds of the restoration has taken place and that she will have to issue 45,000,000,000 francs more.

As matters stand, the French people by their own thrift and by use of their own savings have paid infinitely more to repair the damages done by the war than Germany has paid. Germany either can not or will not pay, and it is very difficult to make a Frenchman believe that if France can pay $53,000,000,000 of debt Germany can not pay $32,000,000,000. However, I am not prepared to say that either one can pay their obligations.

I am not going to discuss the other countries. Italy is in worse condition. I believe last year her budget did not balance the receipts by something like 6,000,000,000 lire, and it is estimated the coming year it will run up to 7,000,000,000 or 8,000,000,000 lire. England has not balanced her budget for four years and is paying out $500,000,000 per annum in gold to unemployed labor.

I do not believe that the French Government will be able to pay the interest or principal of its domestic or foreign debt. But that is not all. In France the Government has borrowed the money from the people. A Frenchman having 1,000 francs in Government bonds or short-time notes can take them to the bank and borrow 80 per cent of their face value and buy some more, because they are paying 5 or 6 per cent. But once let France default upon the interest or fail to float loans to pay that interest, as she has done in the past, there is going to be a collapse in France. This may be a dark picture, but I believe the time is coming when there must be an economic conference in Europe. I do not say that it will be necessary for us to be a party to it, but we may, with profit to ourselves and the world, participate in it. I do not believe, however, that time has yet come. When the countries of Europe make up their minds that they are bankrupt, that they can not pay their internal debts and their external debts, and are ready to scale down both of those obligations, to wipe off the hundreds of billions of inflated currency which they have issued, to put their affairs on a basis where their people can pay their taxes and live and carry on industry and commerce, then it will be time for this country, if invited, to join with them and to use its influence and participate in such a conference.

I, for one, would be willing when the time comes for this country to scale the debt which is due it in proportion to what European countries are willing to scale their domestic and foreign debts, but it is perfectly idle for us to forego our debt and allow the billions upon hundreds of billions of domestic debts in Europe to be paid. It would be like pouring water into the ocean.

Europe, however, is not ready for that. Inflation to an astonishing degree is going on. Germany has a thousand billion marks of paper currency, and is issuing additional marks at the rate, approximately, of one hundred and fifty billions per month. Of course, Germany's internal debt is a joke; it never can be collected and never will be.

France is issuing short-term Government obligations, which she is selling to her people on the basis of 5 and 6 per cent, which is only a disguised form of inflation.

Mr. President, what is to be gained by adopting an amendment to the pending bill requesting the President immediately to call a conference of European powers in Washington, in which we shall participate, until the nations of Europe make up their minds that, like the insolvent debtor, they must scale their debts, must stop their inflation, and must put themselves upon a basis where the people may live, pay their taxes, and advance in civilization?

There is another reason why the President should not be requested to call a conference now. If he is so requested, we shall be met by a law which requires the Debt Commission to settle the foreign debt on the basis of receiving bonds for 25 years at 4¼ per cent. Furthermore, by the deliberate action of the Senate, we declined to participate in the activities of the Reparation Commission, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has stated. Reparations, the debts of Germany and the debts of France, lie at the foundation of an economic adjustment in Europe. I believe such an adjustment has got to come; I believe that we are very much interested in it, for we can not escape the consequences of a collapse in Europe. I disagree only with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in the wisdom of requesting the President at this time to call an economic conference with European nations.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, when the treaty of Versailles was under consideration by the Senate of the Sixty-sixth Congress there were some of us who showed less concern with either Article X or any other provision of the covenant of the League of Nations than with the unconscionable exactions of territory and payments in money or in kind which the victors laid upon the vanquished through the stipulations of the treaty itself. Early in that prolonged discussion I took occasion to enumerate and to analyze those exactions and to point out that their unenforced and unenforcible features contained the germ of future wars and constituted a continuing menace to world peace and prosperity. It is scant satisfaction now, Mr. President, to say "I told you so"; but the slithering down of Europe into the misery and suffering which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has so movingly described is a direct result of the wholly impossible purposes which the treaty makers of Versailles sought to attain. The United States—properly, as I shall always believe—declined to become a party to that compact; and whatever its consequences, we are blameless.

The existing difficulties, therefore, not being of our making, we are measurably powerless to solve them. I do not mean by this, sir, that we might not find somewhere in the welter of proposals which most certainly would be laid before a conference such as the Senator from Idaho has projected some palliative anodyne which would temporarily relieve the distress of the Old World. But no permanent cure can be found in anything which we alone might do—and it is we alone who will be called upon not only to prescribe but to administer whatever treatment an international consultation held now shall determine upon. In consequence of these views I can not support the pending amendment, nor will I approve any similar proposal at any time prior to a sincere effort on the part of Europe itself to better its own condition.

Already, Mr. President, incalculable harm has been brought to Europe by the mere fact of this proposal being made. Famished and voracious peoples again visualize the United States as a geographic Christmas tree. In their minds again floats the picture of plethoric Uncle Sam, warm-hearted and generous, opening his purse to the hand of need whether meritorious or meretricious. They dream dreams of more loans of huge sums without either security or maturity; and in imagination they are already spending our money not for the relief of national or individual suffering but in preparation for more joy rides of imperialism, militarism, and aggrandizement. It is true, sir, that our Department of State in the event that the proposed conference should be summoned would draw its agenda; but like many a preacher, who having taken a text preaches from it, we would surely find the conference collaterally raising questions which are not directly within its purview, and the result of which would be to entangle and embroil the United States in all the jealousies and rivalries of the Old World. Our dread of this was the moving cause for our rejection of the treaty of Versailles; and none who held to this opinion can ever forget or sufficiently reward the senior Senator from Idaho for the valiant and successful leadership which he gave to our earlier action here, nor for the vigor and eloquence with which he swayed the minds of his fellow countrymen when the issue was taken to them in a great and solemn referendum. Three times the American people have rejected such a proposal—twice by constitutional vote in this representative body and once by the direct voice of the people, who by a majority of 7,000,000 approved of our action. Three times Columbia has refused to enter the fantastic household of the Versailles treaty by the front door; yet there are now those who seek in some way to boost her up over the back fence or to push her in through the basement window. I do not believe, sir, that the temper of the American electorate is more forbearing now toward these efforts of indirection than it was when the direct attempt was made to load us with the obligations and implications of the Versailles treaty.

The propaganda to entangle us in European affairs has never ceased. From those early days of 1919, when the highly profitable import of the Versailles treaty dawned in its richness upon the dazzled minds of the scantily victorious Allies and their profiteering partners—the international bankers—the United States has swarmed with propagandists, official and unofficial, sentimental and salaried, all dinning into our ears the strong word "must" and all pointing to us the path of our duty, which they themselves have charted and which leads direct and only to benefits for themselves. I think, sir, that the United States is weary of all this; that the United States deems itself competent to find its own line of duty and to follow it; and that we need no guidance save that of our own conscience, which hitherto has never failed and never will.

Mr. President, I stand in opposition not only to the conference proposed by the Borah amendment now but in opposition to any like conference originating anywhere or at any time prior to a more complete understanding here of the conditions which exist in Europe or prior to any sincere and persistent attempt on the part of European nations to free themselves from the burden of their own folly. It is obvious, sir, that the mere superficial view of distress abroad, which has never failed to produce a sympathetic and generous reaction in the American soul, and which in the present instance has already found expression in public and private benefactions for alleviation of individual misery—it is obvious, I say, that such an appeal can not serve continuously to bleed the American pocketbook. Sooner or later there must be some cessation of the constant stream of American philanthropy, and while it may seem momentarily cruel for America to withdraw utterly from all contact with the economic problems of Europe, I feel certain that such a course would not fail to emphasize to Europe that which Europe most needs, namely, a realization of its own madness.

I have said, sir, that the present plight of the Old World is due much more chiefly to an insane insistence upon the nominations in the bond of Versailles than to any other cause. That treaty far transcended any ever before written in the ferocity of its demands. Having decided upon the ultimate shred of the pound of flesh, in which the United States claimed no share, those who divided the raiment of their foe thought each to secure the lion's share. But the lion's share fell only to the Lion; and after England had seized for herself colonies, mandatory rights, and accretions of population almost beyond enumeration, to France was allotted a majority percentage in a money reparation impossible to collect or even to secure properly. Yet both peoples, the English and French, have continued to nourish a dream of repayment and to look for the fairy godmother who will bring them riches. Great Britain, speaking through her only remaining proconsul, has served notice that Mosul must remain in her possession, while her prime minister synchronously expresses his horror at the thought of a French occupation of the Ruhr region. Meantime English capital, sometimes openly but more often subterraneously, has been taking possession of German port facilities and means of transportation; so that when English efforts, combined with misguided convictions in our own country, have swept the American flag from the ocean, we shall find the cross of St. George once more signalizing not only the mastery of the seas but also a domination of the land which will completely handicap every nation which seeks to enter into fair competition.

Back of all this, Mr. President, lies the fundamental error in financing the war on the part of those who now suffer most grievously from its reactions. Our belated entrance into the conflict was marked by a speedy resolution, well carried out, to distribute war's burdens equitably between generations now on earth and the generations yet to come. Beyond the limit of any nation with whom we were associated, the United States laid its taxes for war purposes, and still continues them; whereas France, to mention the most conspicuous example on the other hand, has had no balanced budget since 1870, has pyramided her public securities in an incredible amount, and at the same time has provoked a condition wherein the tax dodger has become a hero. Under these circumstances, sir, not all the financial resources of the United States, though freely and fully placed at the disposal of distressed Europe, could bring about permanent relief. Our stream of gold would disappear into a rat hole whose labyrinths run off into the highways of maintained armaments, undiminished nationalistic ambitions, and unchecked militarism, in the face of which it may be that the time has come for the United States to turn the tables upon the peoples of Europe and for us to send to them a stream of propagandists to admonish them to their duty and tell them what they must do.

It is significant, Mr. President, that the one nation of Europe, as largely ravaged by war as any other, which has made the most speedy recovery is the one nation of Europe which whole-heartedly has gone to work. It is Belgium, whose currency has fluctuated less, whose despoilment has been most speedily restored, and whose industry has produced the most striking results. When, in the summer of 1920, a ship from Antwerp entered the harbor of New York with a cargo of potatoes sent to the American market from that Belgium which a few years before was feeding from our dole, the world was furnished with its most striking example of recovery from devastating warfare. And what Belgium has done others may do. The Kingdom of God lies within not only the individual but the nation; and until the nations of Europe make some attempt to work out their own salvation I shall continue to oppose any further use of American agencies to solve Europe's problems.

Had we thrust our hands into this abhorrent mess at the outset, Mr. President, through the ratification of the treaty of Versailles, it may be that the power of our influence would have made that instrument operative. Even so, it would have been at the cost of others, and it is improbable that some of the consequences which now confront the world could have been obviated in any event. If we now take up the task it is certain that the cost and consequences will recoil only upon ourselves, and until Europe sees fit to become just there is no occasion for us to be unduly generous.

The implications of what is now proposed can not be winked out of sight. The letter of the President read here on Thursday contains some hint of them. If we engage in any conference such as is here outlined, or in any conference held prior to some earnest attempt on Europe's part to clean her own house, we shall find ourselves in the anomalous and disagreeable position of making decisions between two equally balanced groups of contenders. Our absence from the reparations table leaves the Reparation Commission equally divided upon substantially every question which has thus far arisen. The representatives of England and Belgium generally vote together, with the representatives of France and Italy grouped in opposition. To us, if we sat there, or whenever we sit there, would fall the decisive vote and the decision of the umpire. Our national game, sir, daily demonstrates the uncomfortable position which the umpire occupies; and I have no desire to see Uncle Sam "beaned" by a pop bottle thrown from the European bleachers. [Laughter.]

The only conference which can ever be summoned to produce a satisfactory or efficient solution for the ills of Europe is a conference composed of the powers signatory and adhering to the treaty of Versailles with the purpose completely to rewrite its provisions, to eliminate the greed which marks its every paragraph, to recast the illogical and impossible boundaries which it has set up, and to adjust the compensation for the foe's aggression in a fixed and possible sum and in a manner capable of execution. Until such a conference is called I shall oppose the participation of my country in any other.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	France	McCormick	Shortridge
Bayard	Gerry	McCumber	Smoot
Borah	Glass	McKellar	Spencer
Brookhart	Hale	McKinley	Stanfield
Broussard	Harris	McNary	Sterling

Ernst	La Follette	Pomerene
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed, Mo.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is necessarily absent by reason of a death in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the situation in Europe be considered such that it is unnecessary for us to be interested in the problem of its adjustment, or if it be regarded as such that we can escape the consequences which may follow from even a more serious condition, I can at least understand the position of those who oppose any consideration whatever of the situation. My own position has been based upon the theory that the situation at this time throughout Europe is such that the United States must necessarily be deeply interested, not only from a humanitarian standpoint, but from our economic and business viewpoint also. I understood from the President's letter that it was conceded that the situation was such that we were deeply concerned; that the Executive was giving careful consideration to the entire subject matter; and we were also advised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that actual negotiations were going on as to how we could adjust the economic conditions of Europe. If, however, it be regarded from another standpoint—that the Executive is not primarily concerned because it is not of sufficient moment to concern him, or if we as a people may pass it by as a matter of no concern—then, of course, I can comprehend the position of the opponents of action.

Mr. President, as I said at the beginning of this controversy, before the amendment came up for debate, my mind has been open and still is open as to the method by which we should proceed.

I have an impression, a very strong one, that a conference such as I have in mind is far safer and will be far more effective than any method of dealing with the situation through secret channels or merely diplomatic channels. In that I may be in error, but my belief in the open treatment of all questions with which the public is concerned has led me to think, as I thought with reference to the disarmament conference, that an open treatment of such propositions by the duly constituted delegates to a conference is far more effective and accomplishes greater results than any other method which we could adopt.

I do not think for a moment that had the question of disarmament been left to a series of letters or communications between the foreign offices of the different governments we would ever have arrived at any conclusion of substantial benefit at all. Had it not been for the power of public opinion beating in on the conference here in Washington, had it not been for the power of public opinion, both here in the United States and among the masses in all the countries represented, I venture to say that the difficulties which arose in that conference would never have been adjusted.

With reference to this situation, I view it in the same light. As the able Senator from California well said, we have had conferences and conferences, but they have not been of the nature of the conference which we had here in Washington a year ago, or of the nature of the conference which I have in mind and which I assume the Presdent would conduct if the conference were held. I feel very certan that until the power of public opinion is permitted to exert itself, until the countless millions upon whom this burden falls at the present time are permitted to influence the situation, things will go from bad to worse until they will either suffer incalculably from an economic disaster or from that which is even worse, another conflict.

It has always been contended, and I think with some degree of effectiveness, that had the nations of the earth been permitted to have a conference between the 1st day of July and the 1st day of August, 1914, and had the masses of the people been advised of the fact that war was at hand, a different situation and a different condition of affairs would have resulted upon the 4th day of August, 1914. The people knew nothing of that condition of affairs until the war was upon them, until the diplomats and those representing the Governments had actually brought the thing to the point where there was bloodshed. I believe in conferences and have always believed in conferences, and I believe in this conference.

As I said a moment ago, I interpreted the President's letter in connection with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as evidencing the fact that negotiations were being had to accomplish exactly the same thing I have in view with reference to the conference, and that it was simply a difference of view as to the method. I venture to believe that if that is true there is justification for a difference of view as to the most effective method of dealing with the problem.

Mr. President, I know of no way, other than three, to adjust differences between the nations of the earth when difficulties arise. The first is through diplomatic channels, and that is in the nature of a conference; second, through an open conference, such as has often been provided for and often been held by our own Government with European nations; third, by entering into a permanent arrangement—a permanent alliance or a permanent league—through and by means of which a conference can always be called when an emergency or an exigency arises.

I have always been opposed to a permanent committal on the part of the Government, undertaking to protrude ourselves into the future, and to determine in advance of the development of the facts as to what our course might be. On the other hand, I have been an advocate of the proposition that when an exigency arises, and conditions are such as to call for consideration upon the part of the governments for the purpose of preventing war, a conference ought to be called for the purpose of dealing with that exigency; and, so far as I understood the doctrine with which we have been dealing for the last three or four years, it was a contention between those who believed we ought to have a permanent institution, a permanent understanding, or permanent machinery, and those who believed we could deal with exigencies better when an actual exigency arose, we were opposed to a previous committal or a previous understanding by virtue of a league or alliance, those in favor of a league being in favor of creating such permanent machinery.

That has been my view; it is still my understanding of the proposition, and I venture to say that there is no so-called irreconcilable upon this side of the Chamber who has not indorsed that proposition. We have all stood, either by direct or indirect declaration, in favor of conferences or cooperation whenever an exigency should arise which seemed to demand that we have such a conference in the interest of our country. But we have stood against permanent leagues or alliances which committed us to a course of action prior to a knowledge of the actual facts.

I say again that if it be contended and successfully contended that there is no such situation now, that we are not actually involved in these things, and that we need not be involved in them, then there is no occasion for a conference; but if the situation be conceded to be such as I understand it to be and as I believe it to be, then there is a necessity for one of two things, either the acceptance of a method through permanent machinery or the use of the old-established method of the United States; that is, calling a conference when the actual conditions demand it. I can not believe that we can escape this situation.

Every writer, every student, every traveler who comes to deal with the proposition or who has studied it upon the ground advances the belief that European conditions are such now that they are already affecting very seriously conditions in the United States, and that they must necessarily do so more in the future. I am going to read a paragraph or two from an article which appears in the January number of the Review of Reviews from the noted war correspondent and journalist, Frank H. Simonds, who has been a student of European affairs for years, one of the men who was on the ground in Europe during the war, and has been there for months; he has just lately returned. He reviews this situation in an article entitled "Europe at the turn of the year," and says:

> Taking the dying year as a whole, it can not be denied that it has been in the main the most discouraging since the end of the war. There has been a steady disintegration, a disintegration in many nations and a disintegration in international relations. * * *
> Actually we find ourselves as the year closes facing what must be considered the gravest of Franco-German crises since 1919, for it is marked both by desperation and impotence on both sides. France, like Germany, has become in a sense the victim of the tide running ineluctibly toward that supreme catastrophe, which at least for Great Britain and America is expressed in the obvious likelihood of new military operations and fresh economic anarchy.

Further, he says:

> It is idle to presume that things are righting themselves or that there is any visible evidence that they will. I found on the Continent in March and April a sense of despair absent in the bitterest days of the war, and those who return in December only report the intensification of this feeling of depression. * * *
> And it is well to perceive at the outset that we have arrived at the supreme crisis. Things must now worsen or brighten with small delay, for the mere continuation of existing conditions spells ruin for Germany, for France, and for most if not all continental countries. What exists can not endure.

Mr. President, here is the crisis, if we are correct in our view of the situation, a deadlock between France and Germany with reference to what the Senator from California very properly says is the key to the situation, and with him I fully agree, the question of the adjustment of reparations. Possibly the able Senator may be right in saying that the situation could go on and not grow worse, or, if growing worse, that we can escape its consequences. I am ordinarily more willing to trust his prophecy than my own; but, speaking with such light as I have upon the subject, I am of the opinion that it can not go on without growing worse, and that it can not grow worse without our feeling in a tremendous way the evil consequences.

I venture to say that that is the exact view of the President of the United States, judging from his letter. So, as I understand it, it is not a controversy here as to whether we are interested or as to whether we can escape it, but it is a mere question of whether or not this is the proper method of handling the situation.

Mr. President, the very able Senator from California spoke, in his inimitable way and with his extraordinary power, concerning the ridiculousness of conferences. There is much justification for what he said. I shall not undertake to answer with reference to many of the things to which he called our attention in that regard, but I do call the Senator's attention to the fact that such has not been the result of all conferences. When Japan and Russia were in a deadlock, when they were engaged in war, and when their contentions seemed to invite other great nations of the world, and it was purely a foreign question so far as we were concerned, if any question can be a foreign question, the President of the United States invited those powers to a conference; and as a result of the conference, an agreement or a treaty of reconciliation and peace was adjusted between the powers.

It might have been said in advance of the calling of that conference, "What is the use to call it? Here are two powers engaged in deadly conflict. How shall we as a Nation undertake to settle the difficulties unless we involve ourselves in the controversy which arises between them?" That controversy was over the question of territory, the question of transportation lines—over political, economic, and territorial questions all. But Colonel Roosevelt called the European powers to the American shores, took them out of the atmosphere of controversy, broke the deadlock, and brought to peace that which might have resulted in a world war at that time.

It might have been said, as it is said now, that if we called these nations together we would be under moral obligation to underwrite the transactions of the one or the other or to see that one or the other fulfilled its guaranties.

Japan was to turn back certain territory and Russia was to get certain transportation advantages of the situation, and there was a distribution with reference to material interest, all of which guaranties had to be fulfilled in the future. But we were under no obligation and were not considered under any obligation to underwrite the fulfillment of the contract or to underwrite the fulfillment of the treaty. We brought the nations together and adjusted a conflict, adjusted the differences between them, and sent the nations home from the shores of America to follow out their contract. Was that a breach of the traditional policies of the United States? Was that in violation of the doctrine of no entanglement with foreign powers? It was not so considered. It would be in the face of reason and history to so contend. And are the irreconcilables opposed to such things as that?

Another illustration, Mr. President: It was at the instance of the President of the United States at that time, Colonel Roosevelt, that the second Hague conference was called. I read from the record of the second Hague conference:

The second international peace conference, proposed in the first instance by the President of the United States of America, having been convoked on the invitation of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, by Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, assembled June 5, 1907.

We met there in company with 47 or 48 nations of Europe, we making the forty-eighth or forty-ninth. We met for the purpose of adjusting and providing for arbitral methods of adjustment of all the difficulties or all the conflicts which might arise in Europe or in the world. It was said at the time of that meeting that this was an entire breach of the policy of isolation. As Professor Hazen, in his book "Europe Since 1815," said:

That the problem—

Of The Hague—

concerned all the world; that Asia and America were as truly involved as Europe—

In the adjustment—

that the day of isolation is over, when a nation may live unto itself, was shown in the address of the president of the conference, M. de Staal, a Russian delegate.

Then, Mr. President, I ask to have those remarks inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

That the problem concerned all the world; that Asia and America were as truly involved as Europe; that the day of isolation is over, when a nation may live unto itself, was shown in the address of the president of the conference, M. de Staal, a Russian delegate. "We perceive between nations," said he, "an amount of material and moral interests which is constantly increasing. The ties which unite all parts of the human family are ever becoming closer. A nation could not remain isolated if it wished. * * * If, therefore, the nations are united by ties so multifarious, is there no room for seeking the consequences arising from this fact? When a dispute arises between two or more nations, others, without being concerned directly, are profoundly affected. The consequences of an international conflict occurring in any portion of the globe are felt on all sides. It is for this reason that outsiders can not remain indifferent to the conflict—they are bound to endeavor to appease it by conciliatory action." Among the means suggested are mediation and arbitration. On another occasion the same member said: "The forces of human activity are absorbed in an increasing proportion by the expenses of the military and naval budgets. * * * Armed peace to-day causes more considerable expense than the most burdensome war of modern times"; and another Russian delegate exclaimed: "The idea of the Emperor of Russia is grand and generous. * * * If not this first conference, it will be a future conference which will accept the idea, for it responds to the wants of all nations."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the same time or previously there was incorporated in the proceedings of The Hague this declaration:

Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions or policy or internal administration of any foreign state; nor shall anything in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

Thus preserving both the doctrine as announced by Washington and the doctrine as announced by Monroe in the contemplation of those who took part in The Hague conference.

I cite this simply to impress the idea that we have always believed in avoiding difficulties either by an extraordinary conference or through some permanent machinery for the purpose of bringing in the nations whenever the difficulty should arise. Here were two instances in which this was accomplished and they are notable precedents in our affairs. So it can not always be said that conferences are a failure. It may be said that ultimately when the Great War came The Hague conference broke down, and so it did. But it did adjust many difficulties and may do so in the future. Whether it was efficient or inefficient, it was not deemed in contravention to our established or traditional policy so long as properly guarded.

One more illustration, Mr. President. In 1907 a great war was threatened by reason of conditions prevailing in Morocco. It was, as I understand, although of this I can not speak authoritatively, upon the initiative of President Roosevelt that the Congress or peace conference at Algeciras was called in 1907. But whether it was called at his request or not, the United States attended with its duly accredited representative.

The idea of observers had not at that time occurred to the fertile mind of the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt. He was not by nature a mere observer. He sent men there to represent us, with due authority to represent us, and they did sit in the conference and did assist in adjusting the matters, and history informs us that it was through the leadership of the American representatives or through their dominance in the conference that many of the difficult questions which at one time seemed insuperable were finally adjusted.

That conference had to do almost exclusively with European affairs. There were 15 nations finally gathered at the conference. The only nations which were directly interested were France, Spain, and Great Britain, but ultimately, by reason of the action of Germany, Germany came also to be considered as one having a primary interest in the situation. Sixteen nations including our own adjusted every question relative to a foreign government or to a European government. The question of policing the government, the setting up of an established government, the question of creating a government bank and of running a government bank, the question of transportation, the question of collecting revenue, the question of rehabilitating and establishing a broken-down government in the heart of Europe or on that continent were there effected through the Algeciras conference. It was believed at the time that if the matter continued war would inevitably result between Germany and France and possibly spread to the other larger nations of Europe.

I read a line or paragraph from the treaty which was finally signed at Algeciras and which we signed as one of the treaty-making powers. The United States was a signatory to that adjustment. The treaty said:

Inspired by the interest attaching itself to the reign of order, peace, and prosperity in Morocco, and recognizing that the attainment thereof can only be effected by means of the introduction of reforms based upon the triple principle of the sovereignty and independence of His Majesty the Sultan, the integrity of his domains, and economic liberty without any inequality, have resolved, upon the invitation of His Shereefian Majesty, to call a conference at Algeciras for the purpose of arriving at an understanding upon the said reforms as well as examining the means for obtaining the resources necessary for their application, and have appointed as their delegates plenipotentiary the following.

Then appears the names of the delegates of some 15 or 16 powers. At the close of the treaty is this statement:

The Government of the United States of America, having no political interest in Morocco and no desire or purpose having animated it to take part in this conference other than to secure for all peoples the widest equality of trade and privilege with Morocco and to facilitate the institution of reforms in that country tending to insure complete cordiality of intercourse without and stability of administration within for the common good, declares that, in acquiescing in the regulations and declarations of the conference, in becoming a signatory to the general act of Algeciras and to the additional protocol, subject to ratification according to constitutional procedure, and in accepting the application of those regulations and declarations to American citizens and interests in Morocco, it does so without assuming obligation or responsibility for the enforcement thereof.

Now, I concede that the danger which the able Senator from California contempulates might arise. I am perfectly willing to admit that out of a conference might come an effort of guaranty. But it is not necessary either in fact or upon precedent. I would not feel bound by such a course. I know we can do our full duty and sacrifice no part of our traditional policies. But I feel that if we do not do our full duty we will be brought to a condition where, all for which we contended in that long struggle will be lost. We must have a working program or that which is offered by others, if the emergency becomes dire enough, will be accepted. If the adjustment could be brought about it could likely be brought about under such conditions, if it were desired, as to enable us to deal with the situation as we dealt with these other conditions.

But, on the other hand, while the situation might give rise to these conditions, they could in all probability, or at least if the desire were at hand to do so, be adjusted without any such obligation.

When the Senate ratified this treaty it said:

The Senate understands that the participation of the United States in the Algeciras conference and in the formulation and adoption of the general act and protocol which resulted therefrom was with the sole purpose of preserving and increasing its commerce in Morocco, the protection as to life, liberty, and property of its citizens residing or traveling therein, and of aiding by its friendly offices and efforts in removing friction and controversy which seemed to menace the peace between the powers signatory with the United States to the treaty of 1880, all of which are on terms of amity with this Government; and without purpose to depart from the traditional American foreign policy which forbids participation by the United States in the settlement of political questions which are entirely European in their scope.

Mr. President, I do not regard the proposed economic conference which has for its purpose, if possible, the establishment of conditions which might bring about peace, as being in contravention to any view which those who are opposed to the League of Nations ever advocated. Perhaps I ought to speak only for myself; but, so far as I am individually concerned, I have more than once upon the floor of the Senate, indeed I have a number of times on the floor of the Senate and on the rostrum, stated that I had no doubt as to the responsibility and as to the obligation of this Government with reference to effecting peace throughout the world. I objected to the permanent alliance or permanent league which undertakes to commit us in advance of the conditions which may arise at any particular time.

I do not know, as I have stated, of any irreconcilable, so called, upon this side of the Chamber but who has advocated that doctrine. We have expressed it in different ways. The able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] ridicules the idea of conferences, but he was a candidate for Vice President in 1912 upon a platform which can not be construed in any other light, as I understand, than as being in accord with some method of settlement, some method of peaceful arrangement, some adjustment of difficulties, either through permanent arrangements or permanent alliances or permanent leagues or by the conference which may be called when the exigency arises. That platform provided:

The Progressive Party deplores the survival in our civilization of the barbaric system of warfare among nations, with its enormous waste of resources even in time of peace, and the consequent impoverishment of the life of the toiling masses. We pledge the party to use its best endeavors to substitute judicial and other peaceful means of settling international difficulties.

We favor an international agreement for the limitation of naval forces.

In what way, Mr. President, can we arrive at a settlement of international difficulties; what is the process other than that of either a permanent league or a permanent alliance or a conference when the situation arises, except that of war? The declaration of that platform was to the effect that there should be some other method than that of war by which to effectuate a settlement of such difficulties. We have never taken the position, as I understand, that we could not come in contact with the other nations of the earth; that we are separate and apart from the family of nations; that we have no part or parcel with them. We can only differ, as differ we do sometimes, as to the method by which to deal with them.

In 1919 we all signed what is known as the "round robin," wherein we said:

It is the sense of the Senate that, while it is their sincere desire that the nations of the world should unite to promote peace and general disarmament, the constitution of the League of Nations in the form now proposed should not be accepted by the United States—

And so forth.

How shall the nations of the earth unite for the purpose of perpetuating peace or for the purpose of preventing war or for the purpose of reducing armament? There can be no other way than that which has been outlined in the pending amendment, by a specific conference or a league of some kind.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and I were all signers of that declaration, and never at any time did we take the position in contesting against a permanent alliance that there might not be exigencies in which we should be called upon to cooperate with the other nations of the earth.

The platform which was adopted at Chicago in 1920, upon which the Republican Party is now in power, specifically indorsed conferences as distinguished from leagues or alliances. It reads:

The Republican Party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world. We believe that such an international association must be based upon international justice, and must provide methods which shall maintain the rule of public right by the development of law and the decision of impartial courts, and which shall secure instant and general international conference whenever peace shall be threatened by political action.

So far as that platform relates to the question of international conferences, if I may be permitted to make a personal allusion, I made a special plea to have that provision inserted—and I was at the conference at the time—for the purpose of providing special conferences as distinguished from permanent or established tribunals such as were at that time contemplated.

During the long debate on this subject at different times I declared it our duty to deal with world affairs, but always urging that we should meet them when they arose, something in this way—the way proposed in this amendment. In December, 1918, I said:

I fully understand that we have as a people come into a wider circle of influence and under graver responsibilities than we have known heretofore. I acknowledge in full our duty toward the peace of the world, our deep, vital interest in sustaining and extending and strengthening the domain of international law. I would, as a nation, shirk from no duty; I would meet every obligation.

Upon another occasion, long after the war, I said:

In this stupendous and bewildering crisis America must do her part. No true American wants to see her shirk any part of her responsibility. There are no advocates of selfishness, none so fatuous as to urge that we may be happy and prosperous while the rest of the world is plunging on in misery and want. Call it providence, call it fate, but we know that in the nexus of things there must be something of a common sharing, all but universal and inexorable, in the burdens which these great catastrophes place upon the human family. It is not only written in the Great Book, but it is written in the economic laws of nature, "Bear ye one another's burdens." We do not differ as to the duty of America, we differ only as to the manner in which she shall discharge that duty.

I know of no way to meet the emergencies other than by conferences, unless we propose to go into a permanent league.

I call attention to these considerations, Mr. President, because my friends, with whom I associated in that contest, seem to think that this amendment is in contravention of our traditional policy. Possibly it may be so in the view which they take of it, but certainly it is not so in the view which I take of it and concerning which I have many times expressed myself on public rostrum and also here in the Senate. To my mind, nothing could be further from history and from the facts than to say that these conferences are without results.

Mr. President, what are we going to do in face of the situation now confronting us? Are we going to abandon entirely the idea of undertaking to adjust the economic difficulties of Europe, or is the present situation just such a one as has arisen time and time again when the interests of the United States were directly affected and when it was necessary to deal with and cooperate with the nations of the world in order to bring about an adjustment? If the United States is concerned—and deeply concerned—then if not a conference, what is the plan?

I can very well understand how those view the situation who say that a public conference is not the way to accomplish the desired result; I can understand those who think that diplomatic channels afford a safer and securer and better way to attempt a solution of the difficulty; but I do not understand those who say there is nothing here which concerns. That is a blindness which is incomprehensible. I do not believe that it is possible to escape from its consequences. I think it is true, as I have heretofore said, that we are even now in the midst of it; that we are a part of it; that we are actually dealing with it at the present time, and must continue to deal with it in one way or another until matters are finally adjusted.

I read in a morning newspaper a most remarkable declaration upon the part of one of our representatives in Europe, Mr. Child, our ambassador to Italy, who is now attending the Lausanne conference. I quote from the newspaper article:

Ambassador Child's warning—

Warning, mark you—that Turkey will align herself with other nations which have repudiated their obligations if she wipes out all the capitulation and does not grant something instead as a guaranty of her treaty pledges created a marked impression on the conference and was gratifying to the allied delegates, who regarded the address as advice to Turkey not to isolate herself, as Russia has done.

It may be said, Mr. President, that that is not binding upon the United States in the technical sense of the term, and so I would be willing to concede, but it is binding upon the United States in the broader sense of the term, because we are there insisting upon a certain course; we are dealing with foreign nations and with foreign subjects matter, and our ambassador warns another nation of the earth that a certain course, if followed, will be objectionable to the United States. Will men refuse to concede the plain inevitable effect of such representation? Talk about not being in Europe! That does not rise even to the dignity of sophistry. Talk about not being involved, and getting deeper day by day. And we will continue to drive farther and farther so long as the reparations question is unsettled, for that unsettles all Europe.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Does not the Senator understand that we have an existing treaty with Turkey which formulates the capitulations and that under those capitulations Americans living and doing business in Turkey suffer the penalties of justice through the foreign courts?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. MOSES. Does that make the situation parallel to the one which the Senator has been discussing?

Mr. BORAH. The contention has been made here that Mr. Child was simply there as an observer. If the Senator from New Hampshire is correct in his interpretation, Mr. Child ought to be there as an official.

Mr. MOSES. Not necessarily.

Mr. BORAH. Why not necessarily? That would seem to be the ordinary course, would it not? Why should he be merely an observer if we are there properly to deal with the protection of our treaty rights and that is the purpose of being there?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the question of the capitulations was not within the purview, as I understand, of the agenda of the Lausanne conference at the time it was called. As I tried to point out in the few remarks which I made earlier in the day, that is the difficulty with the conference, that it goes far afield from the questions which were supposedly to be discussed.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will allow me a word further, the question of capitulations is one which has been uppermost for many years in dealing with Mohammedan and other countries which we are pleased to call pagan. So far as the Turkish capitulations are concerned, they extend not only to the continental possessions of the Turkish Empire but even into Egypt, where Americans have been living under treaties containing capitulation provisions. I do not understand that when the agenda of the Lausanne conference was first broached the question of capitulations even remotely was under consideration.

Mr. BORAH. No; it was not; but Mr. Child was there prior to the time that the capitulations or any other subject in which we are directly interested had arisen. Mr. Child participated in the conference from the beginning at a time when matters in which we are directly interested had not yet arisen, so far as the press reports give us the information, and he has been there from the beginning, dealing with all the subjects matter about which the conference saw fit to deal.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if the Senator is directing the burden of his present remarks and those that have just proceeded them to the thesis that we should not have official representatives on these bodies, and particularly on the Reparation Commission, I entirely agree with him. I am not at all in accord with the policy of the present administration or the policy of the preceding administration, whereby Mr. Boyden is maintained in Paris as an official observer in connection with the Reparation Commission and is paid from the German reparations fund, upon which we have laid claim to not a single penny. I quite agree with the Senator if that is what he is attempting to set up.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is in error about our not having laid claim to any part of the fund referred to. We have laid claim to it, for we specifically provided in the German treaty, for which the able Senator voted, that we should have all the benefits of the terms of the Versailles treaty which had been accorded to the United States, and one of them was the payment of the expenses of the Reparation Commission, on which we are now sitting.

Mr. MOSES. But we have never formulated such claims or made demands for them, have we? Has there been any repudiation of the statement of President Wilson at Paris that the United States did not seek and would not take reparations?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know of any repudiation. It was provided that the expenses of the Reparation Commission should be paid by Germany, and the Germans have obligated themselves by the Versailles treaty to pay the expenses of the Reparation Commisson. Of course, we have not collected, and we will not collect for many, many years. They obligated themselves to pay for the troops upon the Rhine. By the German treaty, whch was ratified, we claimed both those rights, and we now have our official representative there—call him "observer" or call him what you may—observing and taking part in the transactions, and the Germans are paying him just exactly as they are paying all other members of the Reparation Commission; and we have our troops there just the same as the other Governments have, and the troops are being charged to the Germans the same as the French troops, and we claim the right under the Versailles treaty, by reason of the German treaty, to collect that amount.

Mr. MOSES. I agree with all that the Senator says in its essence—that we have a representative in some way connected with the Reparation Commission—and I agree with the Senator that he is paid directly from the German reparation fund; I agree with the Senator that we have troops on the Rhine, whose upkeep is an obligation against the German Government; and I hope the Senator is in agreement with me also that neither of those things has proper legal status under the treaty or under any law of Congress; and I hope the Senator agrees with me that Mr. Boyden should come home, with all his entourage, and that the troops should be recalled from the Rhine speedily.

Mr. BORAH. With the latter proposition, as to the troops, I might well agree; but in vew of the fact that we ratified the German treaty and claimed all the rights under the Versailles treaty which had been accredited to the United States by reason of the Versailles treaty, I do not believe that there is anything improper, we having ratified that treaty, in our claiming whatever that treaty gives us. It was agreed to as a matter of treaty. It is an obligation of the German Government, and there is no reason why the German Government should not pay our representatives there just the same as they pay the others. But, Mr. President, what I do object to—if I can find a term which will express my own feeling without being offensive to somebody else—is this maintaining that Mr. Boyden is there as a mere "observer." He is there performing exactly the same duties which would be devolving upon him if he had taken the oath of office and were recognized as a member of the commission.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I agree wholly with the Senator from Idaho that Mr. Boyden's presence in Paris and his functioning there, under whatever pretext, is, if I may use the language of the stonecutter mayor of Concord, N. H., a "subterfurge," and I hope we may put an end to it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask either of the Senators just what are the functions of our representative on the Reparation Commission. Does he vote upon the commmission, or does he simply counsel and advise the commission?

Mr. BORAH. Technically, I think he does not vote, for the simple reason that it has not been thought safe yet to undertake to have an act of Congress passed, but I want to say to you that I believe that anyone who will take pains to ascertain what Mr. Boyden is doing—and he is a very able, very eminent lawyer; no possible criticism can be lodged against him individually—if you will take pains to find out what he is doing, or his assistants are doing, you will find that it is just the same in effect and result as if we had passed an act of Congress.

The President said yesterday that the treaty provided that an election should be had by Congress, and that the Congress had not passed any law providing for that election. Why, certainly, Mr. President; I knew that. I did not have to go to the State Department to find that out. I knew that we had not passed any act; but there is no contention, there is no assertion—I venture to predict that there will not be—that while the act has not been passed, Mr. Boyden is not in effect discharging all the duties of a member of that commission.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, Mr. President, how can that be if the commission has certain things to decide, and to decide by vote—the vote of the members of the commission?

Mr. BORAH. It does not have to decide them by vote.

Mr. STERLING. I should think it would have to decide them by vote.

Mr. BORAH. No; it does not have to decide them by vote. I am informed that once in a while the members have come to a vote on matters. They decide them by discussion and counsel and finally an agreement upon these matters; and that is always true, I understand, when the United States is directly interested.

Mr. STERLING. My idea was that he had about the same function that a Delegate from a Territory of the United States had in the House of Representatives. He was there to influence, so far as he might be able to influence, by speech, perhaps by work upon committees, but without a vote. He could not do the one essential thing—commit his Territory or constituents by a vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator says he is there to influence. Influence whom? Why, influence the man who technically casts the vote. What is the difference, if he is there to exert his influence, if somebody else mechanically puts the vote in the ballot box?

Mr. STERLING. What is the difference in the House of Representatives when a Delegate from a Territory, for instance, may speak?

Mr. BORAH. The difference is that a Delegate from a Territory has no influence.

Mr. STERLING. He has no influence, so far as that is concerned, when it comes to the record and voting.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to paragraph 13 of Annex 2, Part VIII, the reparation section of the treaty of Versailles, which reads:

> When a decision of the commission is taken the votes of all the delegates entitled to vote, or, in the absence of any of them, of their assistant delegates, shall be recorded.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. MOSES. I take that to mean that any decision of the commission has to be reached by vote.

Mr. BORAH. I take it that it does not mean that. If it does, it is not observed. But suppose that they did have to take a vote. Suppose that the actual vote technically was to be recorded; but here sits Mr. Boyden, representing 110,000,000 people, the United States, the most powerful Nation by reason of our independent position connected with the commission, and, as the Senator from South Dakota says, he is there to influence by his argument and by his counsel, but he is there to influence infinitely more by the fact that thus and so the United States would like to see this happen. Now, what is the difference?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, Mr. President, I think there is quite a difference. If it comes to a vote, and if they do decide by a vote of the members of the Reparation Commission, he is outside of that vote, and can not by his vote determine anything.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose that the representative of the United States on the Reparation Commission, sitting there as an observer, should exercise his influence and bring about a certain result by reason of his argument and his influence. Suppose that they should yield to his argument and his influence: Would we not be bound as a nation, by every conceivable rule of morals, to maintain that result? And when they went to Berlin a few days ago or a few weeks ago for the purpose to trying to adjust finally the question of the amount of reparations, did you observe the part—the prominent part, the leading part, the influential part—which Mr. Boyden took in trying to arrive at a conclusion? And if they had arrived at a conclusion by reason of his influence, can it be argued here in seriousness that we were not in precisely the same position, so far as results are concerned, as if he had voted?

Mr. President, that is a technical proposition on which I have spent entirely too much time. I was only calling attention to it to indicate the real attitude which we have now with reference to these European affairs; and there is not one of them of any moment or concern to the people of Europe, or indirectly of concern to the people of the United States, wherein we are not represented. I do not say that we vote. Ambassadors do not determine things by votes; but we are there represented, influencing and counseling certain courses and the adoption of certain policies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And giving certain warnings.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. My able friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has just called attention to the fact that there was no vote when they formed the treaty of Versailles. Does the Senator think there was any vote when they formed the treaties down here with reference to disarmament?

Mr. STERLING. There was an agreement reached in some way. Whether it was by direct vote or not, there was an agreement there upon the part of the parties who represented their several Governments, and who attested that agreement by signing a certain treaty which came up here for ratification afterwards.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose that the members of the Reparation Commission should agree upon a policy, and our member should not agree with them, and after having argued with them and convinced them and influenced them they agree with him, would we not be bound just the same as if he had gone through the perfectly useless form of casting a vote?

Mr. STERLING. I think, with reference to that, something would depend upon the instructions given our representative on the Reparation Commission. But it is understood he is there as an observer. I understand that is the capacity in which he acts.

Take Ambassador Child at Lausanne: He is there as an observer. Now, what authority has he to commit his country to any proposition or to any policy when acting in that capacity? He is there to warn, perhaps, against any action upon the part of the conference that would be inimical to the United States or to its interests. Beyond that he would exceed his instructions, and this Government would not be legally or morally bound by his action.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there is anything that is bringing humiliation and disgrace to the American Government right now, it is the fact that whenever a conference is called in Europe we snoop around and look in upon the proposition and report back to the people of the United States that we simply observed what happened. I can not imagine anything more humiliating to a great country than undertaking to influence situations in just that way.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not mean to put it quite in that light, namely, that he was there simply to look on, and I mentioned the fact that he probably would warn other Governments or warn the conferees against any action that would be contrary to the interests of the United States. That is the capacity in which he acts, and I think that is about the extent of his authority.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; here is the able Senator from South Dakota, the trained and veteran lawyer, and after his defense of Mr. Boyden and his position, if he were on trial for murder upon the same argument he would be convicted without the jury ever leaving the box.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator recall the colloquy yesterday, or a day or two ago, when the question of the instructions given to our representative there by our State Department was before the Senate? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] denied that our representative was there to volunteer his opinions or to make arguments, but that he was there like a small boy, to speak when he was spoken to and answer questions when they were put to him.

Mr. BORAH. I think we may pass from this subject now. We all are agreed upon one thing, and that is that he is there.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, yes; we agree that he is there.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say just a word in conclusion, and I will not trespass upon the Senate longer. The President's letter of yesterday perhaps might be regarded by many as sufficient justification for me withdrawing this amendment. Of course, I desire to speak with the utmost respect with reference to the letter, and I only mention it at all to enable me to state my position.

As I understand the President's letter, it is not his purpose to act in this matter until there is an indication upon the part of the nations of Europe that they desire that action shall be taken. His letter pretty plainly states that proposition. That is a disagreement upon a fundamental proposition. It is not a mere matter of form; it is a matter of difference which goes to the very heart of this entire movement.

If we are to wait until the nations of Europe get together and send us word that they have agreed to disarm, there will be very little occasion for calling any conference at all; but I do not believe that in the present condition of affairs that is likely to happen until much worse conditions happen in this country than now obtain. I speak, therefore, with the utmost respect for the Chief Magistrate when I say that is a matter of disagreement upon a fundamental proposition underlying this entire proposition. I do not believe that we can wait longer upon Europe.

I believe we are in the position Colonel Roosevelt was in with reference to the Russo-Japanese war or with reference to the Algeciras situation, and that we have been in with reference to many conditions which have confronted us, and we ought ourselves to take the leadership in regard to this subject. I do not think it is possible to adopt the course which the President suggests without serious detriment to the American people. About that there is, therefore, that difference of opinion.

I am not quoting his language, of course, but he further says that any foreign policy which now obtains is in the keeping of the Secretary of State, and that it would have been more seemly had the Senator from Massachusetts—I suppose he meant the Senator from Massachusetts, because he wrote the letter to him—had the Senator from Massachusetts visited the State Department and found out what those policies were. I do not assume that that letter was addressed or directed to anyone else than the receiver of it. It might have been misdirected.

Mr. President, there was no occasion for me to go to the State Department to find out what the policy was with reference to this situation, because it was very well understood what it was. It was stated from day to day upon high authority, coming from the State Department, which, of course, always means official authority, thus and so, that "We do not propose to do this and we do not propose to do that," and that "We are undertaking nothing of this kind and nothing of that kind." I anticipated that which the President states in his letter, that it was not the purpose of the State Department or of the administration to move until the Governments of Europe moved.

If that be true, then there is such a wide breach that however many visits I might have made to the genial Secretary of State undoubtedly no result would have happened. I trust that I shall always have the privilege of visiting the Secretary of State whenever it seems necessary to acquire information, and for him individually I have the very highest regard. Personally, he is recognized as a great lawyer and a great statesman, and I am not here to criticize him.

Mr. President, the time will never come when I shall desire to offer a resolution in this body, or when I shall desire to introduce a bill, or when I shall desire to express my view that I shall feel under the necessity of asking the permission of anyone to discharge the duty which seems to me to devolve upon me here as a Senator. If I make a mistake, if I am in error as to any course, I settle it with my constituency, which is the only tribunal before which it can be properly adjusted, and in saying this I offer no disrespect either to the President or to the Secretary of State, but I am simply stating my conception of the duty of a Senator.

I do not understand that the relationship of the Senate to foreign affairs is such that a Senator must not have any views upon a foreign question until he receives his information and his permission to have views from the Executive or the Secretary of State. That is not the constitutional relationship which exists.

Now, as I said in the beginning, if there is no occasion for this conference, if the situation is not one which calls for a conference, if the situation is not one which calls for treatment, there is no reason in the world why this amendment should prevail. On the other hand, if the situation is such that we must deal with it, then I am a firm believer in the proposition that the power of public opinion ought to operate upon this situation.

I would not detract or take away from the Secretary of State in the slightest his power to deal with the situation, even if I could; I would not hamper it or embarrass it in the least; but I do believe that the power of public opinion has a function to perform, just as it did have in reference to disarmament, and without which power of public opinion disarmament could not have been effected.

Mr. President, this situation is far more serious than it seems to be conceded in this debate. Each day the trouble seems to deepen and the menace seems to come nearer and nearer. What may it all mean? It is not many weeks since we celebrated the fourth anniversary of the signing of the armistice—in some respects the most important event since the beginning of the Christian era. I thought I saw in the last celebration a lack of fervor. There was an atmosphere of jaded formality, if not of doubt and anxiety. There seemed to be an unexpressed feeling that the whole thing was untrue, in that there was nothing to celebrate. At the very time of the celebration the war clouds lowered upon the Near East. The formal phrases of the celebration were lost in the accustomed patois of premiers and diplomats speaking in almost indifferent terms of another great conflict. A tremor of dread shot with searching swiftness from corner to corner of a wounded, broken, and almost bankrupt world. The situation is only a little more hopeful now. Indeed, at no time during the last four years have the people of the world been free from the tormenting apprehension of another frightful sacrifice. The whole human family, scarred and tortured, prays for peace; and yet there is no peace. When shall we cease to live in this atmosphere of war? When shall we escape from the spell of war? When shall we loosen the grip of the monster? This is the most stupendous problem in the world to-day. Beside this question all other questions are subsidiary and incidental. Without a solution, and a favorable solution, of this riddle, human progress becomes a misfortune, the inventions of the human mind a curse, and civilization, so called, an alluring trap into which men and women are ensnared to a death of unspeakable torture.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I share in the anxiety of the able and eloquent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which he has so beautifully expressed, for a financial restoration of Europe. No man can turn a deaf ear to the cries which come from that continent, and in common with him, in common with every Member of this body, in common with our whole citizenship, in common with every lover of his race, I long earnestly for the early and complete rehabilitation of that war-torn land.

If I could bring myself to believe that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator would conduce to that desired end, most happily would I give it my support; but being convinced, as I am, that its enactment would but clutter up the entire affair, and that it would retard and not advance the cause he seeks to aid, when it is put upon its passage my vote will be recorded in the negative.

Senators, if the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator is in harmony with the plans and purposes of the administration, we do not need it. If, on the contrary, it runs counter to those plans or purposes, or in any wise interferes with them, we do not want it, for by its passage we would harm and not help the very cause we are all anxious to aid.

The able Senator who has proposed the amendment admits—and as to the proposition there is no dispute—that this primarily is an executive function. Of course, nobody presumes to say that a Senator has no right to introduce a resolution looking to the calling of a conference, but, at the same time, power to initiate negotiations, in so far as they affect our international relations, is executive. Inasmuch as that is an undisputed proposition, inasmuch as we know that the President is already exercising that right, and inasmuch as the honorable Senator in his speech the other day practically asserted that if his amendment interfered with the plans of the administration in this regard, he would at least give the matter most earnest consideration, I believe that the Senator, as he stated but a moment ago, should withdraw the amendment.

What was the language of the Senator?

> It is interesting, however, to know that negotiations are now in progress dealing with the specific subject with which we are now concerned here as a Senate, and if we can be advised that the action of the United States Senate in approving of the dealing with this subject will conflict with or embarrass the program which is now under way, I shall be very glad indeed also to consider that in the disposition of this matter.

Mr. President, who is the best judge of the fact as to whether or not the amendment proposed by the Senator does embarrass the Chief Executive? Manifestly the Chief Executive himself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would concede that; but does the Senator state to me that the negotiations are now under way to accomplish the same thing sought to be accomplished by the amendment?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I shall answer the Senator in my way. The letter of the President read to us on the 28th instant contained this clause:

> Such inquiry would have revealed the futility of any conference called until it is understood that such a conference would be welcomed by the nations concerned within the limits of discussion which the express will of Congress compels this Government to impose.

The Senator from Idaho has construed that to mean that the Secretary of State or our administration should take no action whatever in the matter until European countries shall have requested them to do so. I submit, and especially in the light of what we know to be going on, that that is not the correct interpretation of the clause. What does it say:

> Until such a conference would be welcomed by the nations concerned.

In other words, until feelers should be put out, as we ordinarily express it, for the purpose of finding out whether or not such a conference would be welcomed by those people; and I go so far as to say that that has been done, and that the things that have been undertaken may, if successfully continued, go so far as to result in the holding of a conference in the future.

The President of the United States does not need to be goaded by legislative action into calling a conference on the limitation of armaments. It will be recalled that in his speech accepting the nomination on the 22d day of July, 1920, he uttered this now famous statement:

> I can hear in the call of conscience an insistent voice for largely reduced armaments throughout the world, with attending reduction of burdens upon peace-loving humanity. We wish to give the American influence an example. We must give the American leadership to that invaluable accomplishment.

This sentiment was reechoed in his inaugural address and resulted in the calling of the Limitation of Armament Conference, which I submit marked an epoch in the progressive march of civilization. I am not here to detract from the labor and the work of the honorable Senator from Idaho in that connection; but we all know that the limitation of armaments was in the mind of the President, as is evidenced by the address quoted and by his inaugural address and by many utterances of like character before and since the calling of that conference.

So the President of the United States does not need to be prodded by any legislative enactment into calling a conference for a reduction of the armaments of the world.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. As the Senator has referred to the conference in Washington, it will be remembered that there was a resolution passed at that time somewhat similar to the amendment now pending. Did any harm come either to the Congress or to the President or to the American people or to the peoples of the world because the Senate passed that resolution?

Mr. WATSON. Not the slightest. No harm came, but conditions were different then from what they are now, and the resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from Idaho at that time was on a specific proposition. He now offers an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, as wide as human language can frame it, to the effect that a conference shall be called, the object of which shall be to deal with the economic and financial conditions of the whole world, to see whether or not trade can be resumed and normal conditions of prosperity restored. Conditions then and conditions now differ. Not only that, but there was a specific statement as to the object of that conference. Even then, I am free to say, with all due deference to my honorable friend, the conference of a year ago, which resulted so splendidly to the world, was not called pursuant to the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Idaho, but on the initiative of the President of the United States himself. Not alone that, Senators, but it will be recalled that in many addresses since the adjournment of that conference the President of the United States has gone so far as to say that that was but the first step in the direction of further disarmament. Why, then, should any measure be passed by the Senate of the United States or by the Congress insisting upon the President now at this time calling another conference for the limitation of armament by the nations of the world?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. How can the President call the disarmament conference without action upon the part of the Senate under the provision of the statute which was cited to me the other day to the effect that he is prohibited from so doing?

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator a question by way of answer. I know the Senator will be frank with me. When he introduced the other resolution and when he introduced the pending amendment did he have that enactment in mind and did he introduce the previous resolution and the pending amendment for the purpose of conferring that power upon the President?

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not; but the argument has been advanced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and others that the President could not call this conference without violating the statute until he was authorized by Congress to do it. Does the Senator take that position, or has that argument disappeared?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I have my own answer to that, but I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact the President has the constitutional power to negotiate treaties and to call conferences for the purpose of negotiating treaties, and that Congress can not take away that power?

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota precisely. I think the statute is ridiculous. Who authorized Mr. Wilson to go to the peace conference in Paris?

Mr. WATSON. Nobody.

Mr. BORAH. Who authorized the Secretary of State to call the conference which is now being held here? I merely desired to record the fact that that argument had disappeared.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Idaho could not properly interpret, from anything I have said in this debate, that I believed that the statute read by me was binding upon the President of the United States upon any matter within his presidential power.

Mr. WATSON. No; and nobody knows that better than my able friend from Idaho, because while on his feet he stated that he doubted very seriously whether or not that statute would stand the test, and we all know that it is an interference with the treaty-making power vested in the President by the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator and I am still bewildered to know why the statute was read in this debate.

Mr. WATSON. Because the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] called attention to it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Connecticut is one of the best lawyers in the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. I know he is, but I do not think he called attention to it with the idea of getting the Senator to agree that the President of the United States had no power to act, no power to initiate negotiations, no power to help formulate a treaty, simply because of the enactment of that provision on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest that that statute will have some bearing upon this proceeding which I think will develop later, but I certainly never took the position for a moment that the President of the United States was bound by it in relation to such a conference as is now proposed.

Mr. BORAH. I shall await with some curiosity to know what relationship it is to have.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will find out.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I repeat that inasmuch as the right to initiate negotiations for the formulation of a treaty or for the calling of a conference of this character or for the determination of any of our international relations is an executive function, inasmuch as it is clearly not a legislative function, inasmuch as the President is already exercising that power, inasmuch as he has said the passage of it would interfere with these proceedings, and inasmuch as the honorable Senator from Idaho has said that if it does interfere with or embarrass the action of the President in this regard he would at least take it into kindly consideration, I believe that we are warranted in asking the Senator to withdraw the amendment, and, if he shall not see fit to grant that request, that we are warranted in voting it down by an overwhelming majority.

In the next place, Senators, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in the speech just made, paid much attention to a portion of the argument of the eloquent Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that he did not make, answering a position or overthrowing a position he did not assume. The Senator from California did not say that no conference should be held. He did not take the position that we should not endeavor in conference to settle these questions. What he aimed his shafts at was the idea that the mere calling of a conference would dispel the clouds that hover above us, that the mere calling of a conference would settle all of our ills and provide a panacea for all the woes that so seriously beset us. In that contention I quite agree with the argument of the Senator from California.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am in favor of such a conference, but I am in favor of having its powers clearly defined, of a well-worked-out program, of definite agenda, so that when the conference shall come together it shall work in accordance with a fixed program and along lines definitely laid out.

Let us look back to the conference that occurred in Washington one year ago. Suppose that, pursuant to the resolution passed by the Senate, the one introduced by the honorable Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], a conference representing the various powers concerned had been called together without any previous arrangement, without any formulated program, without a fixed and definite agenda upon which it was to act. Does anybody suppose it would have eventuated as happily as it did? Senators, that was all worked out in advance. It was all prearranged. It was all understood before the gathering of the conferees in this city, and when they did come together the Secretary of State, with a boldness that attracted and with a frankness that compelled support announced the already agreed-on program, agreed on at least by a portion of those who were represented at that conference, and with the announcement of that program success was assured.

Does anybody believe that a conference should be called without any prearrangement, without any formulated program, without any definitely defined agenda, without anything being done for the purpose of determining what the conference is to consider, how far we shall be asked to go, and how far other nations are willing to go?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true, as I recall, that before the conference began its work there was a certain definite, defined agenda prepared. But is it not also true that the four-power pact grew out of that conference and was not even in contemplation when the conference was first convened? Does not that demonstrate also that some good may come out of this conference if it is called?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the question of the four-power pact was of course covered by questions of the Far East which the President added to the matter of disarmament. If the Senator will allow me further——

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I will say while I am on my feet that of course no nation would invite other nations to an important conference without first being assured that the invitation would be accepted. No nation wishes to encounter rejection when it performs such a serious act as to invite other nations to a conference. It is always usual to sound the other nations in order to find out whether any of them will come and who are ready to come. The general purposes of the conference are, of course, then outlined in the informal conversations, which can hardly be dignified with the name "negotiations."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, do I understand from what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has just said that there were any informal or other conferences or negotiations or correspondence relative to the four-power pact before the conference was convened?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the four-power pact was simply the method of disposing of the subjects which had been laid before the other powers. They were not asked, "Will you adopt this treaty" or "Will you adopt the Chinese tariff treaty?" They were asked if they were ready to come into a conference and consider questions relating to China and the Far East.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, during the early part of that conference I confess that I was with a committee of the Senate in Haiti and Santo Domingo, and therefore I can not speak by the book, but I remember very distinctly that when I returned home one of the contentions in the newspapers was to the effect that that four-power pact was not in contemplation at the time the conference was called.

Mr. LODGE. All the questions relating to the Far East were in contemplation; and, as a matter of fact, the question of the Anglo-Japanese alliance had been in discussion between the powers for several months, and it was probably better understood than any other outstanding question which was brought before the conference.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator from Indiana proceeds may I ask a question?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator from Indiana to request the Senator from Idaho to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WATSON. No; I did not request the Senator to do that, but I suggested that it would be entirely proper for him to do so.

Mr. BORAH. It will be proper if I may have an understanding with the Senator from Indiana. Do I understand the Senator to say that he can now state, and does state, as he said a moment ago, that negotiations are now in progress for the purpose of calling a conference?

Mr. WATSON. No; not negotiations. What I said was that feelers had been put out; that foreign nations were being sounded with a view to finding out whether the United States may be helpful, and that, in my opinion, they might lead to a conference; but I have no authority whatever to say that. I speak purely for myself as an individual, and give my personal views, representing the opinions of nobody in authority. At the same time, I am not entirely ignorant of the fact that feelers have been put out, just as the President in his letter states.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to know the details.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know the details.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to know the details.

Mr. WATSON. If I knew the details, I would tell the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but what I do want to know, because I am now dealing in good faith in this matter, is this: The Senator has said that negotiations——

Mr. WATSON. No; not negotiations.

Mr. BORAH. Well, perhaps the proceedings have not ripened into negotiations.

Mr. WATSON. Not by any means.

Mr. BORAH. But feelers.

Mr. LODGE. Conversations.

Mr. BORAH. Conversations.

Mr. WATSON. Conversations is the diplomatic term.

Mr. BORAH. "Conversations across the sea." I understood the Senator to say that conversations or feelers had been put out looking to ascertaining whether or not the United States could be helpful in adjusting the condition of affairs in Europe, and that the Senator's opinion was that ultimately they would lead to a conference covering the question of economic conditions.

Mr. WATSON. Or to some gathering for the purpose of determining the problems. That is the opinion which I have expressed.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator does know that the feelers have been put out?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. And that they have for their ultimate object adjusting the conditions which now prevail in Europe.

Mr. WATSON. To aid in such adjustment.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. The Senator further states that it is the opinion of the Executive that if this amendment shall be adopted it will embarrass the due progress of those feelers?

Mr. WATSON. I only know what the President's letter states; I have not discussed the matter with him.

Mr. BORAH. But that is the interpretation which the Senator from Indiana puts on the letter?

Mr. WATSON. That is the interpretation which I put on the letter.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WATSON. I shall be very happy to have the Senator from Idaho withdraw the amendment, but it has not as yet been offered.

Mr. BORAH. If those who are opposing the amendment do not wish me to withdraw it, if the situation is not as has been understood——

Mr. WATSON. I state my views and my opinion from what I know concerning the situation. I am not here to say that the President has started out to call a conference, such a conference as the Senator from Idaho proposes in his amendment. I am here to say, however, that for the last two or three months feelers have been put out for the purpose of ascertaining the situation and just how far we could go, how far we might be asked to go, and how far other nations would be willing to go in the adjustment of the situation. I do not know to what length that process has gone; I have never said a word to the Secretary of State about it, nor has he to me. I draw my own conclusions from some things that I know.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from Indiana does know that those feelers have been put out?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WATSON. I will.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it not a matter of public record in the newspapers that conversations have been continued for three months looking to a conference at Brussels, always provided that the powers which presumably would sit in conference at Brussels have some basis of agreement upon which they could proceed?

Mr. WATSON. I have so understood.

Mr. McCORMICK. And that failing such a basis until now the conference at Brussels has been postponed from time to time.

Mr. WATSON. For what other purpose would Colonel Harvey have been called home but to discuss the situation and to enable the administration to ascertain conditions in England, and on the Continent as well?

Mr. BORAH. We can deal with this matter in a candid way. I do not pay any attention to what the newspapers say about it on one day, because the next day upon high authority their statements are always denied. So I do not know. I have very great respect for the newspapers, but, of course, they have only one source of information in regard to the matter, and that is "high authority."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit a very humble authority to answer him, I know that such conversations have been carried on.

Mr. BORAH. For what purpose?

Mr. McCORMICK. To the end that a conference may sit in Brussels to consider economic problems.

Mr. BORAH. And that we are to be a part of that conference?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the Senator from Missouri to wait for just a moment—and that we are to be a part of that conference?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, let me repeat I know that conversations have been carried on to the end that a conference may be held in Brussels and that the suggestion may be made to this Government that it may sit at Brussels.

Mr. BORAH. Oh! What a privilege it must be to have somebody suggest that we may sit at Brussels. However, does the Senator understand that conversations have been held by our Government with the view that we are to participate in a conference at Brussels?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think a great deal of complexity has been made out of a very simple subject. I understand that our Government in the usual way, through its ambassadors and ministers abroad, has been making inquiries, holding what are technically called conversations, informal conversations, with a view to ascertaining on the part of this Government whether there was anything it could properly do to improve financial conditions in Europe.

Mr. BORAH. Economic conditions?

Mr. LODGE. Economic conditions.

Mr. WATSON. Economic conditions.

Mr. LODGE. Those conversations have been going on for some time through the usual channels, those channels being the ambassadors and ministers of the United States, and such information as may be derived from them always goes to the State Department. I have not inquired what point has been reached; I only know, as a matter of fact, that the effort has been made to ascertain through those channels whether there is anything this Government could properly do to aid in the reestablishment of economic conditions and business stability in Europe.

Mr. BORAH. And the Senator is of the opinion that if the amendment I have offered should be adopted it would embarrass those negotiations?

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be harmful; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, on the statements of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and of the Senators from Indiana and Illinois I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I should like to have a little further understanding about this mystery. I can see no earthly sense in making so much of a mystery of it. We have spent about 10 days debating the amendment. Finally we were told by the President in a letter that there was something going on and that we could all find out what it is if we would agree not to tell anybody, which, of course, implies that we could not make use of the information, except we could go to bed with it and be very careful not to talk in our sleep. I do not know any more now than I did before the Senator from Massachusetts spoke, and he spoke more directly than any other Senator on the question. We know now that something has been said about some kind of a conference that shall have something to do with economic conditions, but that does not give a man any information on which he may act. If the kind of conference which the Senator from Idaho has in contemplation is to be held and it is either to be held in Brussels or in Washington, I should prefer having it held in Washington, for I think we could keep a little better track of our delegates here than we could over in Brussels.

Mr. CARAWAY. We were not able to do that with reference to our delegates in Washington who framed the four-power pact.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; but God knows what would have happened if they had met on the other side of the ocean.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, how much longer does my friend from Missouri want to occupy my time?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know he had the floor. When I came in there were five Senators on the floor. They all, including the Senator from Indiana, sat down, and I thought that he had yielded the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my amendment seems to be much more popular than I thought it was. I can not get it out of the Senate now.

Mr. WATSON. I am entirely willing for the Senator to say that he will not offer the amendment on the statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BORAH. On the statement made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] and the statement made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I am perfectly willing to decline to offer the amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I wish to apologize to the Senator from Indiana. I had been out of the Chamber for a moment and I thought he had sat down. Of course, the situation is interesting, because I understand the Senator from Idaho is withdrawing his amendment on suspicion. Now, there may be something going on; I should like to know what it is before the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Idaho says that he will not offer the amendment, I imagine the only thing to do is to go on and vote on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Missouri. Why did the Senator from Indiana want to take me off of my feet? Was it merely because he did not want me to speak?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator knows that I always listen to him with extreme pleasure, but I intended to conclude my remarks if the Senator from Idaho had not withdrawn his amendment. He having withdrawn the amendment, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the only regret about it is that I always like to hear the Senator from Indiana speak; but do I understand now that the last clause of the bill is also to be rejected? That calls for a conference.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. BORAH. What does it call for?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; only an invitation to the four powers that signed the naval treaty with us to meet again and consider the question of putting limitations on auxiliary craft.

Mr. BORAH. That is to stand?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether it is to stand or not.

Mr. WATSON. That depends on each individual Member of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I am willing to proceed with the bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, if the Senator will allow me—I have not the bill before me—I think it does not request a conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Indiana to yield the floor?

Mr. WATSON. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand that the House provision requests a conference—I think only a negotiation. I have not it before me.

Mr. WATSON. I can read it if the Senator desires.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. WATSON (reading)—

> The President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan with the view of reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft.

It is merely to enter into negotiations.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that no amendment is proposed to that by the committee. This is the House provision, to which there is no amendment proposed.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; certainly it is a House provision, but the Senate can strike it out.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, when the Senator from Indiana claimed the floor I had reached within about one sentence of concluding all I then wanted to say. But in view of what has just transpired I want to submit some additional remarks.

I think it is about time to quit this policy of secrecy and mystery regarding what our Government is doing. I want to speak just a moment very plainly about it.

A man who is elected President from this Senate floor does not know a bit more the moment after he is elected than he did before he was elected. He is the same man in a different job. His wisdom is not increased a particle. A man who is taken from the bar or the bench of the country and put in the office of Secretary of State does not know a bit more the moment after than he did the moment before he was confirmed by the Senate. The men who are taken from various business vocations or professions and sent to foreign governments do not possess any more wisdom immediately after appointment than immediately before.

There is not one of them whose opinion upon a great matter would have been accepted as a finality the day before he got into office. Why should he be regarded as infallible the moment he is elected or appointed? I am unwilling that the great business of the country shall be disposed of behind veils and curtains when that business has relation to matters of great general public concern and about which there is no necessity of mystery.

I can conceive that a question might arise of such delicacy that for a few days or a few hours it is necessary the negotiations should be carried on without advising the whole world. But a question such as is involved here is a matter of general public concern, and no good reason can be given for all this mystery and secrecy and whispering.

What is the question? It relates to the economic condition of the world. That is public property. Part of that question is, What are the demands of the other nations? That is largely public property. If this Government has any suggestion to make to France touching the loosening of her grip of steel upon the economic and political throat of Germany, would it not be a good thing to say so frankly, and let the weight of the world's opinion be thrown into the balance? Of course, if a conspiracy is being formed to pledge the financial support of the United States or to cancel our foreign debts, there is abundant reason for secrecy, because no man dare accept the responsibility of such a proposition until by skillful propaganda the public mind shall be prepared to submit to the outrage.

A little more frankness in dealing with the Senate and the House of Representatives, a little greater recognition of the fact that Congress is in fact the chief part of this Government, would be a good thing.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that they are in fact or that they are in theory the chief part of this Government?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I mean in law.

Mr. FRANCE. In theory?

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; in law, under the Constitution.

What is the reason, when we are dealing with a foreign government, that the State Department has to put on velvet slippers and go about talking in whispers? Why can not the world be told what America's policy is? Or why can not the President say boldly, "I have asked the foreign nations what they will do, and when I have an answer from them I shall be glad to take the advice of Congress, if necessary"?

I regard the President's letter in which he lectured the Senate for daring to consider this amendment—for that is the import of the letter—as a piece of very bad taste. I remember that Jefferson, I think, in one of his inaugural addresses declared that he would find himself overburdened with the responsibilities of government except for the constant assistance of the representatives of the people.

I have listened to this debate with a great deal of care. It has been conducted along high lines. I think, however, some statements have been made in this debate that are mistakes of fact and that correction is demanded.

To begin with, Mr. President, the statement that the world is going to ruin and that civilization is about to perish is wild exaggeration. I have heard that same statement on other occasions. There is no sense in making it, for it is not true.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a minute?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Take, for instance, the condition in Austria. The secretary to the President of Austria, whose name I can not now recall, but Senators here on the floor, I am sure, will remember it, in speaking of the conditions in Austria, showed me a house that he owns in Vienna that he rents which before the war brought him the equivalent of $4,000 a year in American money. The same house now rents for 40 cents a year.

Mr. Andrée, who is the head of transportation in Austria—he was under the old empire, and still is—told me that the highest-paid man on the Austrian railway to-day, an engineer who pulls the best passenger train, gets a salary equivalent to $87 a year in American money. The street car conductors get $2 a month. Oh, the Senator from Utah drags in the tariff. He is perfectly willing, if they can get a tariff on sugar in Utah, that the rest of the world shall starve. He will be fat on sugar. A lady working in a store or a stenographer in Vienna or in Berlin will get from two to five and some of them as high as eight dollars a month. As to the cost of living, I see sitting over on the other side of the Chamber a Senator who, with me, rented a room in Vienna, and we paid for each night's rental of that room 250,000 kronen.

If the Senator thinks that that sort of an economic condition is merely normal, and that nothing bad can come out of it, when all the agricultural products of that country will feed the people two months and no longer, and if you can buy something outside with that sort of currency, I am curious to know it. I bought for $20, 1,500,000 kronen. I got cheated out of 15,700 kronen because I did not look at the exchange rate that day. Now, those are the conditions.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator—and nobody has kindlier feelings for the Senator than myself; nobody more than myself recognizes his intellectual acumen—the statement he has just made absolutely illustrates the point I am making. I say we have been indulging in loose statements. My statement was that it was ridiculous to argue that civilization was about to perish, whereupon the Senator proceeds to demonstrate that civilization is about to perish from the earth from the fact that rents have fallen in Austria.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator from Missouri will read his remarks, if I may interrupt the Senator again——

Mr. REED of Missouri. I quoted them accurately.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will read his remarks, he will find that he was talking about the economic conditions, that the world was not going to wreck.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; I did not say that. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CARAWAY. When the Senator reads his remarks, he will find he did state that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. We will let them stand just as they are.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I say that it is ridiculous to talk about civilization perishing. It is quite another thing to say—and I was coming to that—that there is financial difficulty in Europe of a serious character.

Another statement made is that there will be war in Europe, and that we will be drawn into it. Mr. President, it is conceivable there may be yet some feeling in Europe and Asia. My opinion is that they are likely to fight as long as they have the ability. The reason is that race hatreds and race prejudices that exist are found in the conflicts of 2,000 years. Those prejudices were stirred into activity by this great war. Peace will not finally come to those countries until compelled by exhaustion. Nevertheless, the statement that the United States will be drawn into those conflicts is about as groundless a bit of imagination as is conceivable. One hundred and six wars, big and little, were fought in Europe from 1812 to 1914, and we were not in one of them. In 1917 we were drawn into the war, not by the economic conditions of Europe but because one of the nations deliberately sank our vessels upon the high seas. We recited in our declaration of war that Germany had made war upon us.

Mr. President, Germany struck that blow at the commerce of the United States because she thought she dared to strike it, and she struck in her desperation. The German Government thought that the United States could not get over there. It thought that if we did get over we could not fight when we arrived. That was the opinion of many European people. No nation will repeat that mistake within the life of any man now living. They have found out that we can cross the ocean. They have learned that these "traders" of America, as they called us, are not very pleasant customers to deal with when they arrive on the battle front.

Let us seriously consider this question of war upon the United States. What nation is going to attack us? Suppose all Europe were aflame with war to-morrow. What European power would deliberately insult the United States of America and force her into that war? Would it be poor, prostrate, bleeding Germany? Would it be exhausted France? Would it be England? Would it be these allies of ours, for whose welfare your hearts are now bleeding? Are you asking us to sit down at the table with the same gentlemen who you say will cut our throats at the first opportunity?

What nonsense to talk about the United States being drawn into any European war. What nation is going to fight us? Where is our enemy? There is but one nation could seriously harm us. Do you really fear an attack by Great Britain? If

I understand the sentiment of the majority of this body, they regard Great Britain as our certain friend. Upon that there may be difference of opinion. I at least do not fear her.

Moreover, we meet with the same contradiction here that we have met many other times. In a breath we are told that Europe is starving, that she is exhausted, that unless we come to her aid with alms in our hands or benefactions in our arms she will perish. In the same breath we are warned that some European nation is coming over here, across 3,000 miles of ocean, in majestic and irresistible force, to conquer the United States. Is there any logic in that kind of argument? Is there any sense in that kind of statement? It may serve to alarm the public and it may be water on the wheel of the propagandists who want the United States to guarantee, in some form or other, by direction or indirection, the private bonds of the American investors across the ocean, but it should not find voice in this forum.

Mr. President, I call attention to another exaggerated statement, namely, that our farmers are going to perish. Right here is a good illustration of the wild statements being made. First it is asserted that Europe is about to perish for food, and the Senator who makes the statement almost in the same sentence declares that we are so impoverished that Bolshevism is about to sweep the country. He asserts that already in the Northwestern States civil government has substantially broken down for want of funds to carry it on. If such a statement is read across the water, the comment will be, "What a frightful condition exists in America." What a picture it will present to the people of the Old World. If the Senator was as badly mistaken about European conditions as he was about American conditions, then his judgment about European conditions is not of much value.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, my good friend the Senator from Missouri is evidently referring to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I appear to have accurately described the Senator's remarks, since he so readily applies the description.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say, in reply to the Senator from Missouri, that the Senator from Maryland took the pains to make a journey to Europe to ascertain what were the conditions.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Did the Senator take a trip to the Northwestern States?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator spoke with reference to European conditions, from what he knew, as the Senator from Arkansas did.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does the Senator think he knows more about European affairs than he knows about the conditions in his own country?

Mr. FRANCE. I will also say that the Senator from Maryland has taken great interest in the agricultural problems of this country and has made a special investigation of the conditions in the Northwest, and if the Senator from Missouri will do the same he will find that my statements with reference to the conditions in the Northwest were not exaggerated.

The trouble with some Senators here is that they do not investigate for themselves, and when some one who has investigated brings to the Senate a statement of the facts as they really exist the other Senators are astonished, as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] seemed to be astonished yesterday when I stated the facts with reference to the food situation in Europe, facts which can be readily ascertained and readily confirmed by inquiries from the proper sources.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, this is a fitting example. The Senator lives away down here in Maryland, a fine State. He has been investigating the Northwest, and says he has found the conditions which I have referred to there exist. He is the only man in the United States who has found them. He says he has been to Europe, and therefore he knows about Europe. I wonder if in his few days' sojourn in Europe he obtained information more accurate than he has of the United States, where he has lived all of his life?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I am not the only one who is familiar with the agricultural difficulties existing in the Northwest, and I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he read the testimony recently given before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and if the testimony given there is what I think it was, he will find, I believe, that the statements I made are substantially correct. The farmers of the Northwest are not able generally to meet their taxes, which was what I stated and which I think is a most unfortunate situation.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator now says that the evidence was that many farmers in the Northwest can not pay their taxes. But a few hours ago he said civil government had broken down and that Bolshevism was about to march across the land. He thus illustrates the very vice about which I am complaining—that is, exaggeration, hyperbole, and wild assertion. It is one thing to say that civil government has broken down and that Bolshevism is rampant and quite another thing to say that some farmers can not pay their taxes this year. The latter statement is a fact. The former statement is balderdash.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is evidently quoting some other Senator than the Senator from Maryland. I misinterpreted his allusion. The Senator from Maryland did not make any such statement as that the Government had completely broken down and that Bolshevism was sweeping the country.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I heard the Senator's speeches. I do not know how they appear in the RECORD; I suppose the Senator let them go in as they were made.

The fact about the matter is that our farmers have had a very hard time, that they are having a hard time now, and if we would make that statement, and deal with the matter in that form, we would be exhibiting some kind of judgment; but when we talk about the country going over to Bolshevism, intimate that anarchy is at our doors, and that civil government has broken down, that is an entirely different proposition. I am discussing the question of exaggeration and overstatement.

The truth is that, bad as the farm situation has been, it is getting better. I have heard it stated that our farmers were in the most desperate plight because Europe could not buy farm products, and that this calamity had fallen upon us because we did not go into the League of Nations, or because we failed to advance more money to Europe, or because we refused to accept the advice of certain international bankers and cancel our foreign loans. But the facts, as was shown by the figures which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] put into the RECORD, and which were compiled by the Department of Commerce, are that we actually shipped over 50 per cent more of farm products, in dollars, to Europe in 1922 than we did in 1913.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, if the Senator does not object to my interrupting him, I want again to call attention to the fact that that increase of exports of foodstuffs was due to the desperate situation of Europe with reference to food; but the exports of other commodities have fallen off very greatly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am discussing one question. I am discussing the exaggerated statement that our farmers have suffered from this condition, or are suffering from it, because we could not ship farm products to Europe. That is the one thing I am discussing, and that is the one thing I for the moment am going to discuss.

Mr. FRANCE. Nobody familiar with the figures has ever set up any such contention. The contention is made that because of the general economic situation the prices of farm products are now at a ruinous point, and to offset the increase of exports of foodstuffs to Europe, there has been a falling off in the consumption of foodstuffs in the United States, due to the depression of our industries, a falling off which is quite remarkable, indeed, one which almost strains the credulity; but the figures are such as I quoted yesterday.

Mr. REED of Missouri. There we are again! We can not keep anybody to any one point long enough to deal with that point. The statement has been made on the floor of the Senate many times in the last 60 days that our farmers were at the point of destruction because Europe could not buy any of our farm products. The cold fact is that we shipped to Europe of farm products in 1913, which is taken as a normal year, a total of $1,145,469,137 worth of farm products, and that this year we shipped over $1,930,000,000. I, of course, wish we had a better market. I am simply trying to answer one of these mistaken, wild, loose statements that have been made. Heaven knows I think the farmer needs a better market. I am willing to do anything I can to give it to him. But let us talk facts and not fancies, let us get the cobwebs out of our brains and some of the big words out of our mouths and describe things as they are.

Mr. President, there is another fact stated here—not a fact but a statement; a mistaken statement—that our people are eating less of farm products because they can not buy them. I make the assertion that wages are higher in the United States to-day than they have ever been in the history of the world unless it should happen to have been some particular peak time directly the result of the recent war. When we can not get a servant in Washington, a house servant or house employee, for less than $75 or $80 a month with room and board, when bricklayers get $11, $12, or $13 a day, when we are building more houses in the United States to-day than at any period of its history, when not only in Washington are the streets blocked with the brick and other building material, but likewise blocked in every city of the United States, when labor is in fact employed—not all of it, for there has always been a percentage of unemployed, but quite up to the average—what is the use of standing here and saying the people can not buy food and that therefore there is a surplus of our farm products going abroad?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Corroborating what the Senator stated, I read a magazine article the other day written by a college professor—I assume it is correct in its facts—in which he deprecated the extent to which meat eating by the people of the United States had increased in the last year, and proved, if his figures are correct, that the consumption of meat products per capita to-day for food in the United States is greater by far than has ever been known in the whole history of the country.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not mean to say that things are ideal. I do not mean to say there are not men and women out of employment, and more out of employment than I would like to see. But that is a very different thing from saying that our people are so impoverished that they can not buy food, and that that condition exists to such an extent that we had to ship the food abroad because we could not find anybody here to eat it, and that they could not eat because they were so impoverished they could not buy.

Mr. FRANCE. That is the Senator's statement, not mine. My statement was that in 1920, when we had on an average 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 of men out of employment, a fact which was generally conceded, the consumption of wheat in this country fell off 250,000,000 bushels, as compared with the previous year. Those are the figures of the Department of Agriculture. I do not know whether they can be verified—I have no means of verifying them—but I am taking the figures of the Department of Agriculture. It is undoubtedly true, whether those figures are exactly accurate or not, that there was a great falling off in the consumption of wheat in 1920 during the hard times.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am talking about 1922 and about the statement that was made here that the principal reason why we sent agricultural products abroad in quantity this year, which is the year I talked about, and I have talked about no other year except 1913 for comparative purposes, was because the people could not buy them here. What is the use of talking about 1920, then? I have not been talking about it.

Mr. FRANCE. I was referring to 1921, as compared with 1920. There are no figures as to the consumption of wheat during 1922, inasmuch as those figures can only be compiled at the end of the year. But the Senator was questioning the fact that the falling off in the consumption of foodstuffs was so marked at periods of depression.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I was not questioning that at all. I was talking about 1922 shipments of our grains and farm products to Europe. The Senator then rose and proposed to explain why we have shipped those products, and the reason he gave was that the American people could not buy enough to eat, and hence they had to be shipped abroad. Now, if he made a mistake in the year, it is all right; but I did not make any mistake in the year.

Mr. President, what is happening? We are shipping abroad farm products, and the prices are not satisfactory in comparison with certain other very high prices, but the prices have been gradually coming up. I do not say the farmer has not the right to complain loudly and ask for all the proper assistance that can be rendered, and if a bill with that object in view is offered—a bill that is sound—I shall support it. But that is a very different thing, I repeat, from the declaration that the country is absolutely going to ruin.

Then, again, as I called to the attention of the Senate the other day, we are told in one breath that we are about to go to ruin, that we are tottering over the edge of the precipice of bankruptcy, and in the next breath we are told that we are rich enough to feed the world. There ought to be some sense and some consistency in the discussion of these questions. Neither of those statements is true. Neither are we on the edge of the precipice of bankruptcy nor are we able to feed the world. We are just about able to take care of ourselves in a decent manner. But if these dreamers, these purveyors of wild statements, steering the ship of state would not merely lose the true course, they would run it head on against the bald face of the ocean's granite walls. They would never know the wall was there, or if they did, they would think they could transform the solid rocks into open waters by the mere power of their imaginings.

We are constantly lectured about our responsibility to Europe and our responsibility to humanity. We are told we are our brother's keeper.

Interpreted in plain English, that means that we must go over and tell the rest of the world how it shall live, how it shall conduct its business, and what kind of government it shall have. Are we "our brother's keeper"? Suppose our brother does not want us to "keep him"? There is not a single nation that wants us to be its keeper. Try even for an hour to be the keeper of the proud French people, you will find the agreeable and polite French people suddenly transformed into tigers that refuse to have a keeper. The French nation would not permit us to be "its keeper." The English nation does not want us or any other nation as its keeper. The last Englishman, from the blue-blooded aristocracy to the humblest cockney, would stand in the trench and drain his veins before he would permit us to be the keeper of England. The mistake that France is making to-day, and I say it boldly, is that she is trying to make herself too much the keeper of the German people.

It is one thing to collect an indemnity and to impose war conditions calculated to prevent a recurrence of war and it is quite another thing to drive a people to the point of desperation. If there is any grave danger to this world, any tremendous catastrophe lying in the near future, it will come from the fact that there may be created a condition in Germany where in their desperation that mighty people will hazard everything rather than endure extremity.

I pass from these exaggerations, of drawing false conclusions, to a review of some of the facts as I see them. The plain fact is that war has to be recovered from gradually. A war is not over when the battle flags are furled. When that time has come the war still has to be paid for. We are exactly in the condition of a patient who has endured the racking tortures of a terrific fever for a long period of time and is wasted away.

When the fever ceases it takes months and perhaps years for convalescence and a complete restoration of strength. Mistakes were made in settling the terms of peace. Countries were carved up; Austria was reduced to such small dimensions that, as my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], I think, mentioned—at any rate, it is well known—she has a city of over 2,000,000 people and a total population, I believe, of only six or eight million. I will ask the Senator the number.

Mr. CARAWAY. Six million.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That impossible condition was imposed and those people are suffering. That is a condition that ought to be righted; but is it our problem? We might tender our good offices. I would make no objection to this country tendering its good offices; but I insist that we did not cut the Austrian Empire into pieces and it is not our business to take the responsibility of putting it together. We can, however, offer our good offices.

The next difficulty is the inflation of the currency of certain countries. The reason it takes thousands of kronen to buy a bed is because the Government was issuing a few billion kronen while a gentleman is taking off his clothes to get into bed. They do not have money at all; they have printing presses and paper. They run the presses night and day and print a lot of stuff they call money. When that paper——

Mr. CARAWAY. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator when I finish the sentence. When that piece of paper, which simply had a printing press run over it, is not accepted by the world or by anybody as an equivalent of gold or as an equivalent of anything, its purchasing power goes to nothing. That is the reason why the people of certain European nations have to pay such enormous prices. Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he has demonstrated the fact that he is the only man in the Senate who knows anything about economic conditions in Europe.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, the Senator ought not to make that remark. I have not said anything unkind about anybody or assumed any superior knowledge.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, I was just going to say, with all that superior knowledge, will the Senator tell us what the people of Austria, for instance, are going to do when paper money is the only money they have?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, that is quite another question than the one I am discussing. I am discussing the reasons the currency of certain countries has no value. I am willing to discuss the other question later. But let me say to the Senator I have assumed no superiority of knowledge.

I am offering my views just as he offers his. I do not profess any superiority, but I do claim the right on this floor to submit the facts as I understand them and to submit my views along with the views of other Senators.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I do not wish to be offensive and did not intend to be, but I understood the Senator from Missouri to be lecturing everybody else and deploring the fact that all the statements which had been made were reckless and were not based on facts but merely assumptions of facts.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am merely arguing that some of those statements are assumptions of facts. I have not charged that the Senator from Arkansas has not stated the fact about anything. I will take his word for the value of the bed over there and as to the condition of the currency.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not curious that the Senator should do that; but if I may interrupt the Senator for just a moment, what impressed me was that, if I understood him correctly, he assumed that everybody who had made statements about economic conditions had made wild and, the Senator said, foolish statements.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, no. The Senator now is illustrating just what I have been arguing. He says that I assumed that everybody who had made a statement had made a foolish statement. I made no such assertion. I have discussed certain particular statements and have sought to show that these particular statements are exaggerated. Whereupon the Senator accuses me of having declared that everybody who made any statements about economic conditions had made foolish statements.

Mr. CARAWAY. I rather think the Senator himself may be illustrating what he is arguing.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Possibly so. I said that some statements, in my judgment, were wild statements, but I did not say that everybody had made wild statements. If the Senator will just notice what I say——

Mr. CARAWAY. I always pay the most particular attention to what the Senator from Missouri says, because it is interesting.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. Of course, if Austria or Germany or Russia turn their printing presses loose and print bales of stuff which they call money, that will not make it money. So when I am told that it costs a man a million kronen or a million francs or a million of some other kind of money to buy some little article, that does not mean anything except that there is in that country no honest money in circulation. They have not the gold back of it, I suppose, and they have not any credit back of it. If they had credit back of it their money would be of more value, because people would expect it to be redeemed some day.

Why do they not have credit? There are many answers to that question, but it seems to me that one reason Germany has no credit is because she can not get the amount of indemnity which she must pay fixed and can not get any arrangements made to pay it with which she thinks she can comply. Until that is done no banker will loan Germany money; nobody will sell her goods on credit; no nation will loan her money. So we get down to the fact that at the root of the whole situation lies a political problem. Senators may call it economic, but the economic condition is created that it may be used to establish the perpetual dominance of France. I only speak my judgment, for we can not prove these things, but judging by the circumstantial evidence I have no more doubt in my mind that France wishes to stay in Germany, that she proposes to hold the occupied regions forever if she can, than that I am standing on this floor. Hence she does not want to fix the indemnities at a figure which Germany can meet. In that I can not much blame the Frenchman. He views everything from his nation's standpoint. But, viewing the same question from our standpoint and from the standpoint of the world outside of France, I think a great mistake is being made and that an unjustifiable thing is being attempted.

We may call an economic conference here, but until the French nation has gotten into a frame of mind where it is willing to adopt a different policy, I do not know what may be accomplished by such a conference.

When will France get into that position? When she finds that she is being abandoned by the rest of the world in her attitude and when, perhaps, her own economic condition compels her to adopt a more moderate course. However that may be, so long as the European nations expect the United States to stand by as a Lady Bountiful and put up the money they will continue to insist on everything they can get. Those are not our problems. They do not want us over there for any other purpose except as we may come to contribute to them. They do not want us to be "their keepers."

Again, it has been said "that we might as well understand that the United States is a part of the world." The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in substance declared: "I solemnly adjure you from that shadowland which I am about to enter and, speaking with the wisdom of the ages, to recognize the fact that the United States is part of the world."

In the name of common sense, who ever doubted we were part of the world? Being a part of the world, however, is a very different thing from setting ourselves up as the boss of the world. Being a citizen in a community with a right to your own home is quite a different thing from undertaking to boss your neighbor and drive him out of his back lot. We have been a part of this world since that glorious day when the farmers rallied along the lanes of Lexington; we were a part of this world before that; but England did not yet know it; she thought we were a part of England. We have been a part of the world down through the century and the half of our existence. We have been the only part of the world that has been able to maintain clear and unspotted its title to be called just. Because we have not tried to overrun the world; because we have not tried to impose our will upon the world; because we have not tried to be a part of the world, in the sense that we undertook to dominate and boss the world; because we have stayed at home and pursued the American policy of attending to our own business and letting the remainder of the world attend to its business—for that reason we occupy the proud position we do to-day, with all the rest of the world saying "Come over and help us." The trouble is we never get through helping them.

Mr. President, out of this turmoil the world will emerge. Somehow or other France and Germany will adjust their difficulties. It may mean another slice from Germany; it may mean a long period of payments; it may mean that other countries over there directly interested will intervene to some extent; but, rest assured of one thing, the world will still be here; humanity will not disappear; the temples of justice will not all be dissolved in ashes; the schools of learning will not vanish in "thin air."

Let us get the blood out of our heads. They have been trying to do some things over there that they ought not to do and they have made some trouble. I think, without any question, England encouraged Greece to war on Turkey; I think, without any question, France came to the aid of Turkey; and I think both of those nations have learned a lesson.

There will be some disturbances, but you can trust the European statesmen to have some sense. We do not possess all of the wisdom. If we can just get out of our heads and hearts the conceited idea that America has a magic wand, and that whatever she touches will turn to gold, and that her statesmen can sit down in conference and solve problems that none of the other statesmen of the world can solve, we will be wiser than we are now.

Mr. President, let America keep out of Europe. Let us tell the European countries that what they owe is a sacred debt and that we expect payment. Let us deal with them as justly and as considerately as we possibly can in regard to times of payment. If a conference is called to consider the rehabilitation of Europe, I have no objection to the United States tendering its good offices.

I do insist, however, that we shall not accept any part of the responsibility for the present conditions of Europe. We did not make it. I do insist that we shall not sit down at any table or engage in any conferences which will bind the United States to send another dollar of money there or to send another man there. Let us stay at home and attend to America. While its condition is not anything like as bad as some people have maintained, it nevertheless is bad enough to need our attention and all the ability we have.

Mr. President, my heart bleeds for those people. I said I was in favor of not sending another dollar over there. I do not mean in that statement to include cases of absolute want and starvation. I would not object to reasonable contributions of that nature but I am opposed to our undertaking to carry their financial loads. It was said here this morning that the French people loaned the French Government the money to carry on this war and that the French Government never will be able to pay them.

Well, that is a question for the French Government and the French people; but, if the statement be true, then who should suffer the loss, the French people who loaned their money to France or the American people who had nothing to do with the transaction? The French people own these debts, and if the country is in such condition it can not pay, the French people will have to reduce or cancel the debts.

There is one thing about this enormous war debt out of which we can get a grain of consolation, along with all the bad that there is in it, and that is that European countries have so much debt on them now that probably that debt itself will prevent any big war in the near future.

Mr. President, in what I have tried to say I have simply sought to point out the fact that there has been constant overstatements of the real situation. No great and appalling catastrophe is going to happen to America. I have every confidence that European statecraft and European business ability will solve the problem over there; but I have this to say: If you are ever to get the world upon its feet financially you must let people go to work successfully, and peoples can not work unless they have markets in which to sell.

I want our State Department to tell us why we are not placed in a position to trade openly and freely with Russia. There are 180,000,000 people there, with a territory several times as large as that of the United States—a great people, though they may have what we regard as a very foolish or bad government. They have always had a very foolish or bad government, and they have a bad one now, but I question whether it is as bad as the Czar's government was. Why is it that we are not making an effort through our State Department to open the doors of Russia to American trade?

Take a map and examine it; look at the picture of Russia and compare it with that of Europe. The rest of Europe in point of territory dwindles almost into insignificance. Why is it that we are stupidly sitting here and letting other nations get the Russian trade? Why do we not do something for our own people and open those doors?

Why is it that Mexico, with only the Rio Grande dividing her from us, is largely cut off from American trade to-day? What kind of stupidity is it that does not open that door? How long does a government have to exist before it can be recognized? What kind of civil-service examination and certificate of character will satisfy the State Department and the President?

Open Mexico to American trade! Let American farm products find a free market there. It is true that some goods are shipped there now; but as long as we do not recognize that country properly, its credit, its ability to get on, are under a severe handicap.

Here, then, are two great countries of the world partially cut off from us. Why do we not help them by recognizing them?

You say you do not like the Russian Government. Well, did you like the government of the Sioux Indian when we traded with him? Did you like the government of the Czar of Russia when he ruled by his Cossacks and his bayonets? Did you like the government that was set up by Belgium in the Kongo? And yet we traded with Belgium. The business of the statesmen of this country is to open the doors for trade and commerce, and we will do more for agriculture and labor in that way than we can by all of the resolutions and laws we can pass in this body; but we sit supinely here pursuing a policy which, whether or not it was wise in the first instance, certainly is not wise to-day.

You talk also about helping Europe. I should like to see these people helped, but I want to put this to you: What is the use of shedding tears about the poverty of Germany or Austria, where there are millions of willing hands anxious to work, if while we are shedding tears over their impoverishment we pass a law that in substance and effect declares that we will not buy anything they produce?

Mr. President, I submit this question to the Senator who visited that country and gathered much useful information: If the Austrian people could find a market for their goods at fair prices outside of Austria, does he not think Austria would soon rehabilitate herself? Would not Germany soon improve her fortunes?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I think myself, to speak of Austria first, that Austria would have to have more than a market for her products.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It would help.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, it would help, of course. That is what would restore us, if we had a market. It would restore any country to a very large extent if it could get a market for its products and get raw materials out of which to work them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If, however, we had an economic conference, and a German statesman or an Austrian statesman came in and said: "Our people are willing to work, but you will not let us ship our goods here and give you goods for your money," what would say our friends upon the other side of the Chamber? They would declare: "We can not disturb the tariff."

I understand that other countries have passed laws that are very inimical to trade with Austria. If that is the case, then that is a matter for statesmanship. I think I can speak for this side of the Chamber and say that if our friends on the other side will agree to it we can remove that one difficulty as far as America is concerned, and we can reduce our tariff very promptly, and let them have a market for some of their goods. Is it not a bit of arrant hypocrisy to talk about helping Germany and helping Austria and helping Europe, while we are posting customhouse officials at every port of this country, with instructions to keep out all foreign-made goods unless they pay a prohibitive tax?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this debate has done some good. I am glad this amendment is withdrawn, and I hope that the State Department and the President at an early day will conclude that if they can not let the Senate or the Congress know what they are doing, lest the information might be misused, they will take the American people into their confidence. If they do not take the American people into their confidence pretty soon, the American people will take care of them in that happy day which is approaching.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did intend to speak on the Borah amendment; but since it has been withdrawn I shall not occupy any of the time of the Senate other than to say that I think that it was a very unwise and mischievous provision, and if enacted into law I am quite sure that it would have resulted in a great deal of harm not only to this country but to the other countries of the world.

In connection with what I had expected to say I had prepared certain figures that I now ask may go into the RECORD without reading. They are the domestic exports of agricultural products from the United States during the calendar years 1913, 1921, and 1922 in dollars, and the domestic exports of agricultural products from the United States during those same years in pounds and in bushels, showing the quantities in each of the three years mentioned, namely, 1913, 1921, and 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Domestic exports of agricultural products from the United States during the calendar years 1913, 1921, and 1922.

Commodities.	1913	1921	1922[1]

Mr. SMOOT. I also ask that the total values of imports and exports of merchandise into and from the United States by months during 1921 and 1922 be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Total values of imports and exports of merchandise into and from the United States, by months, during 1921 and 1922.

[1] Imports for the period from Sept. 22 to Oct. 31 under the new tariff act are greatly delayed on account of the great number of defective entries filed with collectors of customs since Sept. 22, which failed to show the information required by the new tariff law and the revised statistical schedule. The compilation of these figures is proceeding very slowly, and according to present information from the customs service it will be the first part of January before they are available.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Treasury Department has not yet figures of imports for the months of October and November and the balance of December of this year. But I notice that the daily statement of the United States Treasury dated December 26, 1922, shows that the customs receipts collected up to the 26th of this month are $33,516,176.66, and for the corresponding period of last year they were only $20,313,316.13, or an increase of a little over 65 per cent for this year. For the fiscal year 1923—that is, beginning July 1, 1922, up to the 26th of this month—the amount collected was $244,938,120.13, while in the corresponding period of last year the receipts were only $141,166,526.08. So, whatever may be said of the tariff keeping goods out of the country, the record does not show that to be a fact.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, very little remains to be done on the naval appropriation bill, and I hope Senators will remain for a short time so that we can complete the consideration of the bill, and I can thereby be enabled to move an adjournment until Tuesday. If we do not complete the bill to-night we shall have to sit to-morrow to conclude it.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wanted to move the adoption of some formal amendments. Mr. President, I ask that we proceed with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 9 it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, in the following words:

OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.

For employees in the Office of Naval Intelligence, $30,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except two persons at $2,000 each.

[Mr. MCKELLAR addressed the Senate. His speech appears on p. 1105, December 30.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one word in regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. I concur with him in his desire to curtail naval expenditures to the utmost. The attitude of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in that respect is very well known. It has taken a very pronounced and very strong position toward a very drastic, far-reaching reduction of the Naval Establishment, and the Senate committee reporting this bill accepted the figures as reported by the House committee and as adopted by the House.

The Senator from Tennessee has read in part from a report made by the House committee on the bill, in which reference was made to recommendations which that committee made last year. This year they abandoned those recommendations and accepted the figures which had been established by the House of Representatives itself after a most exhaustive study. In the preparation of the appropriation for the Naval Establishment the year before—for 1922—the same question was gone into very exhaustively in the Senate and in the Senate committee. The Senator is basing his conclusion on a number of general figures, which I think are entirely erroneous, with regard to the comparative size of the personnel of the navies of Great Britain, Japan, and the United States. The Senator says that the enlisted force of Great Britain is 84,041 men. That is true, so far as the regular navy of Great Britain is concerned, but their navy is upon an entirely different basis from ours. That figure does not include the air force, while the 86,000 men provided for in this bill does include the air force. The entire air force of Great Britain numbers 29,517 men. The entire air force of the Army and Navy of the United States is 13,619 men.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If you add the difference, then there are a great many more enlisted men in the American Navy, relative to its strength, than there are in the British Navy, according to the Senator's own figures.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Under the agreement recently made by the Arms Limitation Conference it was agreed that the Navy of the United States should be maintained upon an equal basis with that of Great Britain.

Mr. MCKELLAR. As to capital ships only.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Capital ships are the unit of naval strength; but the spirit of the treaty was, and the basis upon which the entire agreement was reached was the assumption, at least on our part, of our true naval policy, that the two navies should be of equal strength. As a matter of fact, in the existing establishment the British Navy is very much larger than that of the United States. In the same agreement it was provided that the Japanese Navy, taking capital ships as the unit of naval strength, should be upon a relative basis of 3 to 5. As a matter of fact, the enlisted strength of the Japanese Navy at the present time is 65,469 men, as against 86,000 provided for in this bill. Fifty-one thousand six hundred men would be the relative strength of the Japanese Navy if the two navies were to be maintained upon a ratio of 3 to 5 upon the basis of the pending bill. In other words, the Japanese Navy contains an enlisted strength of 13,867 men above the ratio of 3 to 5 on the basis of the pending bill and our naval strength provided for the current year.

The total enlisted strength of the British Navy, counting their air force, the Australian Naval Force, the New Zealand Navy, the Canadian Navy, the Royal Indian Marines, the Royal Fleet Auxiliary, the navy signaling station, and men on yard craft of the mercantile marine, who are doing the work that is done by enlisted men in our Navy, is 102,934 men, as against the 86,000 men provided for in this bill. In the much more vital matter of trained and educated officers, Japan, instead of being on a basis of 3 to our 5 is practically equal, having 7,705 officers to our 7,707 officers. Great Britain, instead of being on a ratio of 5 to 5, has 9,442 officers to our 7,707.

Mr. President, I want to make another comment upon the figures given by the Senator from Tennessee. He stated that the difference of 19,000 men, as between the number of men provided for in the bill as reported by the committee and the 67,000 who would be provided for under his amendment, would amount to a difference of expense of $30,000,000. As a matter of fact the entire cost of the maintenance of a seaman is less than I gave the other day. I gave the figures to the Senator the other day as a thousand dollars. Upon a careful examination I find it is even less than that—that the entire cost of the maintenance of a man, including his salary, his clothing, and his provisions, is $840 a year. So that the entire cost of the maintenance of this number of men, instead of $30,000,000, would be only a little over half of that, or $15,960,000.

In view of the very exhaustive examination and exhaustive discussion of this matter which has taken place recently, in which everybody who was interested in the discussion on both sides took part, and in which every argument was marshaled for and against the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, I do not think it is necessary to go further into it at this time, and I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Washington whether he desires to proceed further to-night. I dislike to call for a quorum, but I feel constrained on this amendment to ask for a yea-and-nay vote. If the Senator will let it go over until to-morrow or Tuesday, I will not ask for a quorum now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it be in recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if he would object to taking an adjournment so that we can have a morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was in hopes that we could take an adjournment from to-morrow until Tuesday. If we take a recess, it will save some little time and may enable us to do that. On Tuesday the ordinary business that is transacted in the so-called morning hour would come up.

Mr. KING. I do not want to discommode anybody, but——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection in the world to taking a vote on my amendment this afternoon. The Senator in charge of the bill has been exceedingly kind to me with reference to my necessary absences.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would be very glad to have a vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee now.

Mr. KING. I stated to the Senate, and the Senator from Tennessee must have heard me, that I shall ask for a roll call upon his amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I heard the statement, but there is probably no hope of getting a quorum here at this late hour.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was in hopes that the Senator from Utah would withhold that point of order until we had disposed of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah said he would ask for a yea-and-nay vote on my amendment.

Mr. KING. I said I did not want to call Senators back this afternoon, and I asked the Senator to let the vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee go over until to-morrow or until Tuesday.

Mr. LODGE. It will go over until Monday, if we do not finish it to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Of course, Senators on the other side of the aisle have the power, I suppose, to determine when we shall adjourn and the hour to which we shall adjourn.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is much preferable to arrive at some amicable agreement.

Mr. KING. Certainly; and I do not want to ask for a roll call this afternoon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course the Senator can state his position, but I was under the impression that he had reference to a desire for a yea and nay vote upon the amendment which he gave notice he would offer.

Mr. KING. No; I desire a roll call on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then I renew the unanimous-consent request which I made a moment ago, that when the Senate conclude its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, December 30, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate December 29 (legislative day of December 27), 1922.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Harry C. Whitehill to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 2, with headquarters at St. Albans, Vt.

POSTMASTER.

TENNESSEE.

Blanton W. Burford, Lebanon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 29, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Every good thing in all the world, blessed Lord, is but a single ray of Thy light. We bless Thee that Thou art the rock of our salvation, the foundation of all heavenly vision, and shepherd of all Thy earthly children. Always enable us to be useful as true friends and helpful as wise advisers in public and private councils. When silence means the pause of disappointment; when plans are overthrown; when energies are misdirected and end in the defeat of our best wisdom, then, our heavenly Father, take us by the hand, light and lead the way, and give the heart the blessing of repose. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a matter of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a matter of procedure. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we hope to conclude the bill now under consideration to-day and to complete the Post Office appropriation Tuesday. It is possible we will not get through with the Post Office appropriation bill on Tuesday. I want to give the House abundant opportunity for proper consideration of that measure, but on Wednesday, under the agreement that has been entered into or the understanding that has been had, we vote on the Agricultural bill, the Interior Department bill, and the Post Office appropriation bill, if it is ready, and complete the consideration of the Post Office bill if we have not completed consideration up to that time. I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business on Wednesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would defer that request until Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee returns. He can ask unanimous consent on Tuesday.

Mr. MONDELL. On both of these matters I had an understanding with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] before he left; otherwise I would have discussed the matter with the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I request that the bill H. R. 13552, a bill to extend the provisions of the Federal highway act to Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, be transferred to the Committee on Roads. I had the consent of the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, and the ranking member of the Committee on Roads, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], also consents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be transferred from the Committee on the Territories to the Committee on Roads. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13559, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13559, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 21, line 15. In this connection I will state that request is made simply that the committee may fully keep faith with a Member of the House. Unintentionally the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] was misinformed as to the bill by the subcommittee, and so to keep perfect faith with him I ask to return to that item.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the close of yesterday afternoon, immediately after reading the last paragraph, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] had an amendment he desired to offer. This would not interfere with his amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 21, line 14, after the word "drugs," strike out the words "including peyote."

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and my colleague [Mr. CARTER] for their courtesy in this connection. When this bill was presented to the House for consideration I asked my colleague [Mr. CARTER] if there was anything in it which refers to the use of peyote, and he, misunderstanding me, said no. Therefore the bill passed to consideration, and I did not know that this item was included in it until afterwards, when I had made an examination of the same.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure every Member of this body wishes to keep faith with those interested in this subject. At the present time there is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary a bill which has been introduced for the purpose of depriving the Indians of the use of peyote in their religious rites. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, informed me this morning that the hearings had been started and that they would be resumed during the month of January.

Representatives of the various Indian tribes throughout the country who are interested in this subject know this, and they have made plans to send their representatives to Washington for the purpose of explaining to the committee why they desire the use of peyote. Inasmuch as this promise has been made to them, and another committee is considering this legislation, I contend that we should keep faith with the Indians and allow their representatives to come here to Washington and present their case.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Is this narcotic, or whatever it is, used at any other time except at these festivities?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have not heard of any white person using peyote. It is one of the Indian customs that they have had from time immemorial.

Mr. HICKS. Is it very injurious to their health?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Authorities differ as to that. If any person has ever been injured by the use of peyote, I never heard of it. We have taken away from the Indians nearly everything else. No white person becomes addicted to this habit—if it is a habit. It is claimed that it is used in connection with religious rites. I can see no reason why we should keep their representatives from coming to Washington and having this matter fully considered before it is acted upon.

Mr. HICKS. What is the effect upon the users of this drug?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I take it that it is used as certain religious denominations use unleavened bread for sacramental purposes. I have no positive information in this connection.

Mr. HICKS. Does not the use of this plant give effects similar to the use of opium?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. What particular denomination uses this stuff?

Mr. McCLINTIC. It is used in connection with certain rites pertaining to the Indian religion. They believe in the Great Spirit, and they use peyote in connection with their worship.

Mr. MILLER. I believe in the Great Spirit, but I do not see what this stuff has to do with a belief in the Great Spirit. I have never seen any great reverence manifested toward the Great Spirit when they used this stuff.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I understand peyote is the dried bloom of the cactus plant. The Indians gather it and distribute it among those who are affiliated with their various religious denominations, and at certain intervals they use it as a religious rite.

Mr. MILLER. I have seen a good many of them come out of their meetings on their hind legs, as you might say, or come out of the barn on their hands and knees.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Even if that is true—and I do not say it is true—we have a bill pending before the Committee on the Judiciary that refers directly to this one subject. Hearings have been started but not completed. The chairman of the committee informed me this morning that those hearings are to be continued in January. The representatives of those tribes are coming to Washington at great expense. Therefore I think in a spirit of fairness we ought to allow them to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that a year ago, when this same provision was placed in this bill, this whole subject was thrashed out here on the floor of the House, even over the strong advocacy of the matter by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN]. At that time the same bill to which the gentleman now refers was pending before his committee, and had been pending the whole year, and no action had been taken on it. For what reason have we to presume that in another year or in two years any action will be taken?

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that at that time there was, I think, a bill pending, but it was pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs and not before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was pending.

Mr. CARTER. It was pending; but if the gentleman will permit me to finish my statement he will understand it better without further interruption. The bill was pending, I say, before the Committee on Indian Affairs. A long and exhaustive investigation was made as to the deleterious effects of this drug. I attended some of the hearings before the subcommittee; I attended most of them; and the testimony was decidedly conflicting as to whether it was a deleterious drug or not. Scientists on both sides of the question took exactly opposite positions, some saying that it was deleterious and others saying that it was not deleterious and that it was used only in their religious worship and not otherwise. Frankly, I am unable to tell the Members of the House after listening to the testimony whether it was deleterious or otherwise.

Mr. BLANTON. Was there as much controversy over that matter as there is now among some physicians relative to intoxicating liquor and dope?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes. There was much more conflict of opinion as to the effect of this plant peyote.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If there was a conflict among the highest authorities and a new committee has jurisdiction over this subject and new hearings have been started—which will be resumed, as I am told, in January—and the delegates have been notified to come to Washington to be heard, in a spirit of fairness I think we ought to let the matter go over until it can be thoroughly looked into.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the subcommittee, with more or less definite knowledge of the subject, considers that peyote is a dangerous drug and that its use should be limited.

The parliamentary situation, however, is this: The Snyder Act permits us to bring in appropriations to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquor and deleterious drugs. The language as to peyote would be in order on this bill if it is a deleterious drug. If it is not a deleterious drug, the language is not in order.

If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] had not been misinformed as to the provisions of the bill he would have been here and would have made a point of order, and he would have made that point of order to-day, except that I suggested instead that he make his motion, in view of the facts set forth, to strike out the word "peyote" in this bill, and I assured him that if he did so I would not oppose his motion. Of course, I could not commit anyone else, but I hope his motion will prevail. There are hearings being held before the Committee on the Judiciary, which has legislative jurisdiction of this question, and we may let that committee proceed to get the facts. If the gentleman had made his point of order we could have argued here for half an hour or an hour, and I am not sure how the Chair would have finally ruled, but I am sure he would have found it somewhat embarrassing, and the whole question would have been to decide whether or not peyote is a deleterious drug. It is understood that if this word "peyote" goes out of this bill now it is without prejudice to anyone. The Judiciary Committee can go ahead with its hearing. On the other hand, the Indian Service will have an appropriation of $25,000 for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and deleterious drugs, and if the Indian Service decides that peyote is a deleterious drug it may take steps within the appropriation to suppress it just as well with the word "peyote" out of the bill as with it in the bill. I simply want it understood that if the word "peyote" is taken out here, it is not an expression by this House that peyote is not a deleterious drug or that it ought not to be suppressed. By striking it out we will simply eliminate this controversial question and let the hearings go on before the Judiciary Committee. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope this motion will not prevail. Coming from a State which has had much trouble over the question of religion, I think I should be the last one to rise in opposition to a proposition that would in any way prevent the exercise of religious freedom; but I happen to live in a county in Utah where there are a great many Indians and where this drug has been used. I would be derelict in my duty if I kept quiet now. My own State has passed a law against the use of peyote. Indian Department officials approved of that bill. I happen to know personally that the use of this drug has caused the death of Indians in my home county. If it were truly a religious rite I should be reluctant to oppose it, but I do not believe it is such. The followers and believers in the use of peyote in my home county, at least, do not pretend to have a new or strange religion but use the Bible as a part of their so-called religious rites in order to create the impression that it is a religious service. They insist that they believe in the Bible as a basis of their religion. The promoters of the peyote traffic deceive these helpless people by parading peyote in borrowed rituals of the Christian Church. They exclude visitors. Twelve feathers dangle from their staff, representing the Twelve Apostles. The Bible is opened and chants are sung, repeating the holy name of Jesus, all of which is accompanied by the beating on a drum. Peyote, a drug akin to morphine, is passed around on a communion plate. Surely no one will contend Jesus ever taught such a religion. They get drunk, just as much so as any man ever was drunk with opium or alcohol or any other narcotic. To say that that may be done under the guise of religion is stretching religious freedom altogether too far. [Applause.] If religion is the worship of a Creator or Great Spirit, as we have been told, what does a drunken man know of it?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. In just a moment. One other thought, and then I will be glad to yield. These men do not recover from the use of this drug for several days. I once visited one of their camps. A man was wallowing in the dirt and mud two days after a drunken spree on this peyote, absolutely irresponsible, having no rational thought of what he was doing, and not being able in any way to take care of himself. This was the result of his participating in this so-called religious ceremony and using peyote. You might just as well argue that we should protect the users of opium or alcohol if they say it is a part of their religion.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I promised to yield first to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC. As the gentleman comes from the State of Utah, of course he appreciates the fact that his Indians are of a different tribe from my Indians. His Indians may have one religious ceremony and mine may have another. His Indians may use peyote to an excess, if such a thing is possible, and mine may be more moderate. The faith of my Indian tribe may differ from that of the tribe in the gentleman's State, just like the Methodists differ from the Baptists.

Mr. COLTON. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; but——

Mr. McCLINTIC. But inasmuch as this matter has not been determined by any authority that is recognized as to whether or not the drug is deleterious, and inasmuch as that question is being considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, does not the gentleman think it would be fair to let the testimony be taken and then decide this question once and for all? That is the point I make.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I know that people's religious ideas differ, but I happen to have personal knowledge of the effects of this drug; it is deleterious. While religions may differ, I am sure that human nature is the same everywhere, and if that drug is used to excess in Oklahoma it is bound to produce the same results that it produces in Utah. I believe the overwhelming weight of authority, scientists wholly disinterested, shows that it is a dangerous drug.

Mr. BLANTON. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If only the men were engaged in this debauchery that keeps them in a stupor for several days it would be bad enough, but the evidence taken before the committee at the time this matter was gone into thoroughly showed conclusively that the women engage in it the same as the men. It is a common debauchery that lasts from two to three days and sometimes a week.

Mr. COLTON. Yes. If I am correctly informed, the man who introduced peyote into my county is now being held for trial before the Federal court for having debauched the whole family with which he was living.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask that the gentleman may have one more minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks an extension of one minute for the gentleman from Utah. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. I judge from the gentleman's statement that he regards peyote as a deleterious drug.

Mr. COLTON. I think there can be no question about it. The deaths to which I referred were traced directly to that cause.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the Indian Service find that to be the case and the appropriation reads "for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and deleterious drugs," they will have ample authority to handle the peyote situation just as well as if there was express mention made of peyote.

Mr. COLTON. I think the gentleman is probably right; but in view of this having been reported in the bill now before the House, with the word "peyote" in the bill, if we strike out the word will it not be presumed at least that Congress is winking at the use of the drug? Nothing as yet having been done, will not the department officials assume that Congress intended that nothing should or would be done?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is only to be stricken out with the express understanding, concurred in by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC], that taking the word out of the bill is not in any way to carry the impression that we have passed upon the question whether peyote is or is not a deleterious drug.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given half a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Utah be extended half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to say that I am just as anxious to protect the Indians as the gentleman from Utah is.

Mr. COLTON. I am not doubting that.

Mr. McCLINTIC. And if it is found that this is a deleterious drug you will never hear any complaint from me; but until this matter is decided, I think we ought to give them a chance.

Mr. COLTON. But, Mr. Chairman, knowing as I do the evil results of the use of peyote, I believe we ought to take active steps now to stop its use, and I hope that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be limited to 15 minutes, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas, and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, before we vote on this amendment I want to set the record straight. The first bill introduced in Congress to suppress the use of peyote among the Indians was proposed by Mr. Gandy, of South Dakota. The Sioux Indians in that State were using this drug, having been taught to do so by certain Indians from Oklahoma. Later it was proposed to revise the laws in relation to the sale of intoxicating liquors to the Indians, and I introduced a bill making all such laws applicable to peyote. It was on that bill that exhaustive hearings were held before the Committee on Indian Affairs. We had the benefit of the testimony of witnesses from all parts of the country. Gentlemen say there was scientific evidence presented to the committee that peyote was not a deleterious drug. I challenge anyone to produce from the record any testimony from any scientist to that effect. The only testimony favorable to the use of peyote was not by a scientist, not by a member of the medical profession, but by an employee of the Bureau of Ethnology. He undoubtedly knew much about the ancient customs of the Indians, because he had devoted most of his life to that subject. He was more interested in Indian antiquities than in the problems which the modern Indian must face. This ethnologist expressed his regret that the Indians had abandoned their old ways of living, because he could no longer observe them under conditions of primitive simplicity. Being opposed to the advancement and civilization of Indians in general, he, of course, did not want any interference with the use of peyote.

Upon the other hand, Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, of the Department of Agriculture, and numerous other witnesses testified that peyote, the scientific name of which is anhalonium, is very similar in its effect on the human system to morphia, cocaine, and other like drugs.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. I believe the gentleman would agree that both Doctor Wiley and the scientist from the Bureau of Ethnology claim to have given peyote to certain patients and observed them under the influence, and one testified that it was deleterious and the other that it was not?

Mr. HAYDEN. Doctor Wiley, who was a real scientist, fully demonstrated the effect of this drug by administering it to an employee of his bureau and carefully observing its evil effects.

The ethnologist also claimed to have observed the effect of peyote on the Indians, but his testimony was not based on the results of scientific study.

My bill was reported to the House containing a prohibition against the use of peyote by the Indians and was passed by an overwhelming vote. When the Snyder Act was under consideration language was placed in it authorizing appropriations for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and peyote, and the House went on record a second time as being opposed to peyote. In the Senate the word "peyote" was stricken out of the Snyder bill. It was brought back here after a conference, and in order to get legislation the House had to eliminate peyote from the bill. It was done for the same reasons presented a few minutes ago by the chairman of the subcommittee, that if peyote is a deleterious drug it made no difference whether it was specifically named in the law or not.

My judgment, candidly expressed, is that it does not make much practical difference whether peyote is named in this bill or not. I think it is best to leave it in, because the House can thus go on record for a third time in expressing its opinion that peyote is a deleterious drug. I therefore hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma will be defeated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this whole matter was thrashed out a year ago. The gentleman from Michigan knows that unless peyote is left in the bill the Indian Bureau is not going to make any attempt to suppress the use of peyote as a deleterious drug, and its baneful use will continue. The proponents claim that it is an exercise of a religious rite and we ought to leave the use of it to the Indians. There are yet Indians in other countries that believe in the religious rite of eating their enemies after they kill them, so that they may become possessed of all of their victims' virtues. I suppose it would be claimed, therefore, if our Indians believed in this as a religious rite that we ought to let them exercise it. If any band of Indians should believe that it is necessary to throw their children to the crocodiles as a religious rite, we ought to permit them to continue that because it is a religious rite. That is the argument.

There is no question in the world but what, if any Member will sit down and read carefully all the hearings to which reference has been made, he can not escape the conclusion that peyote is a deleterious drug and that it ought to be suppressed. In the hearings you will find several witnesses who have used this drug, giving their own testimony as to the effect that it had upon them; that they had the wildest hallucinations possible, that they finally lost consciousness, that there was utter abandonment, possessing both men and women, and that men and women sometimes spent nearly a week in this debauchery in their tents. There are men suffering in California to-day from the drug habit who believe that they have the right to use it as we do our coffee.

There are men to-day who still believe they have the right to continue the use of intoxicating liquor in the form of light wine and beer, and they are even so near to the city of Washington as the city of Baltimore, and, because they believe in it, they may even go so far as to believe that it is a religious rite in their exercise of it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How does the gentleman spell "rite"?

Mr. BLANTON. I spell it r-i-t-e, and then I may also spell it r-i-g-h-t, because both are applicable in this instance. We still repress intoxicating liquors, even though some of its advocates are prominent Members of Congress who are reported to be here on a 50–50 vote of Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman indorse the charges made by his colleague, the Representative from Georgia, Mr. UPSHAW, as to the wholesale violation of the Volstead Act by Members of Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is ridiculous.

Mr. HILL. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I was present on this floor when our friend the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] made that speech, and I witnessed our good friend, the distinguished rider of the great white charger, from Baltimore sitting right here on the front seat, and I saw him heartily applaud the statements of the gentleman from Georgia more than did any other Member of the House.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman surely will not now deny it.

Mr. HILL. No; and I applauded because if any Member of this House is violating the law, he should stop it; but I do not believe any Member is violating the law, and I believe those charges are incorrect.

Mr. BLANTON. He heartily applauded the gentleman from Georgia at that time, and then waited for the gentleman to go back to Georgia to spend his Christmas recess, and in order now to get a little newspaper notoriety he calls on him for proof of his charges.

Mr. HILL. Oh, if I wanted newspaper notoriety, I would try to learn from the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman would learn well if he did; but that action really is all poppycock, to ask that evidence from the gentleman from Georgia. The gentleman from Maryland knows that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] is not going to give away any of his colleagues, even if he knew of any violation of the law.

Mr. HILL. But I do not believe that he has any evidence.

Mr. BLANTON. And neither the affable gentleman from Maryland nor myself would give away any of our colleagues on that proposition if we knew of such evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, there are three reasons why I am opposed to the amendment striking from the bill the provision for the suppression of peyote. First, the amendment should not prevail, for unless the words are in the bill, in my judgment the department will not attempt to enforce the law against the use of peyote. The committee will remember that more than a year ago when the Snyder Act was passed by the House, it included the word "peyote" together with the present language "deleterious drugs," and that the word "peyote" was eliminated in the Senate. What other construction can the department place upon the intent of the law, after a word has been included by one House that was later stricken from the bill in the other Chamber, than that the Congress did not intend to include that word in the law itself? This must be the reasonable conclusion of the department. As further evidence of the fact that this is the attitude of the department, let me say that when the question was asked of Assistant Commissioner Meritt a year ago, when we conducted our hearings upon this bill, whether or not the department had authority to apply the deleterious drug laws against peyote, Mr. Meritt replied that there was no authority. The question was:

So you have no authority for the suppression of peyote at all?

The reply of Mr. Meritt was:

No, sir.

I say, Mr. Chairman, then that the first point upon which it is suggested that the amendment be eliminated—that the department now has authority—will not do to rely upon, because the department does not believe that it has authority to enforce the law against peyote.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will ask the gentleman to wait until I get through with my statement first and then I shall yield. The debate has been limited.

Mr. WINGO. Well, you will not limit it any more to-day if members of the committee can not answer questions. I think we would better get a quorum here.

Mr. FRENCH. The committee limited the time of debate; I did not; and I hope to have time to yield in a few moments.

Mr. WINGO. I just put you on notice that you will have to do that.

Mr. FRENCH. There is a second reason why I am opposed to the amendment prevailing. It has been urged that the matter is before another committee. Upon that same theory you could throw into the hopper a bill providing that we should not enforce the law against intoxicating liquors, opium, or morphine, and come in here and assure the House that if the drugs were deleterious the law could be enforced, and that we need not make specific provision awaiting the action of another committee. Surely that will not do.

If that be sound logic, you could forever prevent the enforcement of law against the suppression of any drug or against intoxicating liquor simply by introducing bills and keeping hearings going before some committee.

There is a third reason why I am opposed to the amendment, and that is because of the deleterious effect of the drug itself. We should provide for the suppression of peyote. It has already been referred to by gentlemen who are on the committee in manner that should challenge every Member. I was on the committee when the hearings were held. There is no question in my mind that this drug is akin to opium or morphine in the disastrous results that it has upon the human system. The gentleman does not do justice to himself in describing the use of the drug by the Indians as a religious rite. The testimony shows that so-called ceremonies sank into revolting orgies that lasted for days. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman stated that the chief reason why he was opposed to the amendment was that the bureau would not enforce the law.

Mr. FRENCH. That is one of three reasons, that the bureau feels that it has no authority.

Mr. WINGO. Then he proceeded to tell why, and in doing so laid down a new rule of interpretation of statutes.

What justification has the Indian Bureau for refusing to follow the well-known rule of interpretation of statutes in enforcing this law?

Mr. FRENCH. It seems to me that the general interpretation is the one that I have suggested.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, the gentleman is a lawyer, and he would not say here Congress in debate cut out the inclusion of one specific class and contented itself with a general class, that that indicated because Congress had refused to include one of a class that it meant it did not intend to enforce the law against all of the others?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, not at all; if it were recognized that the specific class were included within the general. But here it is disputed. Without arguing that point, however, I would suggest the gentleman read the testimony of the assistant commissioner to which I referred, where he said that as he construed it the department did not have authority of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCLINTIC) there were—ayes 12, noes 40.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks for tellers. Not a sufficient number have arisen and tellers are refused, and the Clerk will read.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I was promised yesterday afternoon an opportunity to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 70, after line 10, insert a new paragraph as follows:
"Except in fulfillment of treaty obligations no money appropriated by this bill shall be used to improve, enlarge, or in any way maintain any school owned or controlled by any religious denomination or organization. This, however, shall not be construed to forbid to any Indian the right to have his pro rata of tribal funds used to pay expense of a pupil in the school of his choice."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment may be limited to 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by myself and 5 by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Pending the reservation of the point of order, I submit the time should not be fixed. If the gentleman wants to make a point of order, that is all right; but pending the point of order debate only occurs by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I object to fixing the time for debate pending the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. In view of that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. Of course, I have not had time to examine the amendment carefully. As I understand the form of the proviso it is legislation, is of a legislative character, and is not a limitation.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. That it is legislation and is not purely a limitation. I do not care to take any time in arguing it. I submit the question to the Chair.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to argue that it is not anything except a limitation. It corresponds exactly to limitations that have been recently placed in other bills. We had just a few days ago a limitation in regard to the use of the stop watch, the spending of money where the stop watch was used. I do not think it is necessary to argue the point.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for just a moment on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. In one moment. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, of course there could be no question whatever about any part of the amendment being subject to the point of order except the proviso. Now, with reference to the proviso, that in no way changes existing law. In other words, an Indian under the present law has the right to do everything that the proviso specifies; hence it is not a change of existing law; hence it is not legislation. But without the proviso the amendment might be construed as changing existing law pro tanto—that it would take from them existing privileges safeguarded in the proviso. So I think, Mr. Chairman, clearly the proviso is not subject to the point of order made.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I only arise to suggest—I have not had an opportunity to examine the amendment carefully—but I understand the amendment proposes to limit the expenditure of money. Then follows a clause which provides that under some conditions the Indians may be given money. Now, if that clause only serves to limit the limitation it is in order, but if it goes further than that and authorizes the payment of money to Indians beyond what the act would authorize without the amendment, then I submit that this is legislative and subject to the point of order. The Chair has the language before him, and I am satisfied with his judgment in regard to that.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the proviso, it does not provide an allocation to the Indians; if it did, I think possibly the point of order would be well taken; but it reserves the right to the Indians to have the use of a proportionate part for these private schools, and I think that is simply a widening of the limitation.

I simply think it is a widening of the limitation. I think the amendment is perfectly in order.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, may we have that proviso reported again?

Mr. BUTLER. Let the whole amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. LOWREY: Page 70, after line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"Except in fulfillment of treaty obligations, no money appropriated by this bill shall be used to improve, enlarge, or in any way maintain any school owned or controlled by any religious denomination or organization. This, however, shall not be construed to forbid to any Indian the right to have his pro rata of tribal funds used to pay expense of a pupil in a school of his choice."

Mr. LOWREY. I do not believe we need to discuss that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. As has been well stated by the gentlemen who have spoken regarding the point of order, the first part of this amendment is practically a limitation and within the rule. The difficulty in the mind of the Chair arises with regard to the last sentence, as follows:

This, however, shall not be construed to forbid to any Indian the right to have his pro rata of tribal funds used to pay expense of a pupil in a school of his choice.

That proposition, attached to the statement of the amendment, in the judgment of the Chair raises a question as to its being in order, and I think the Chair should rule that an amendment of that sort should not be held in order. I think it would establish a dangerous precedent if the Chair should do so, because while it is stated here by gentlemen that this is not a change of existing law, the Chair does not know that, and the committee does not know that. As it is evident that the form of the amendment as a whole is very obscure, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment with the proviso left off.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

Amendment offered by Mr. LOWREY: Page 70, after line 10, insert a paragraph, as follows:

"Except in fulfillment of treaty obligations, no money appropriated by this bill shall be used to improve, enlarge, or in any way maintain any school owned and controlled by any religious denomination or organization."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] and 5 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LOWREY. I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. How much time does the gentleman need?

Mr. LOWREY. Five minutes is all I care for, but I think there are other gentlemen on both sides who would like to discuss it further.

Mr. CRAMTON. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman agree as to time?

Mr. LOWREY. I do not know what gentlemen want to speak on it.

Mr. WINGO. I am a little bit impatient at this rushing of a lot of supply bills through, with only a handful of Members present, and——

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman object to my request for a limitation of 10 minutes?

Mr. WINGO. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that there is any man who is in favor of religious liberty who is not in favor of just as much liberty for the other fellow as he claims for himself, and is not just as much in favor of liberty for another denomination as for his own, and I have certainly not offered this amendment in any spirit of religious prejudice or religious antagonism.

A gentleman said to me, perhaps more in jest than in earnest, "The Ku-Klux have been after you." If there is an organization of the Ku-Klux Klan in my district, I do not know it. If that was remotely sprung in any way in my last campaign, I do not know it. If anything touching on religious tolerance or intolerance was sprung in my last campaign, I do not know it. I am happily situated, in that particular, at least. My district and my constituency are certainly very largely free from any trouble of that kind. Yet it has been talked, and talked for years, and we all know it and we might as well meet it squarely, that in the matter of the Indian appropriations the real American principle of religious liberty, absolute religious freedom, and of no kind of partiality in religious matters, was being violated. I do not state that. I say that has been talked, and we all know it has been talked.

Now, I will go further and say that some religious papers have spoken editorially, I think, and in decidedly gratulatory tones have rejoiced in what their church was getting from Government allowances.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a matter of fact that while there are discussions on this subject at the present time, there is not a dollar of the money that is appropriated for the Indians and their care and protection that goes to any denomination for their expenses?

Mr. LOWREY. I am coming to that. That is my next point. I was going to say that I have talked with the gentlemen of the committee and with gentlemen of the Indian Bureau on this question, and they claim that the spirit of my amendment here is in no way being violated now. Well, if that is true then certainly there can be no harm in a declaration from the House to set at rest the agitation that is on and that is going to stay on until the question is properly settled. If there is no violation of this amendment, then it certainly can do no harm for the House to make a declaration. If there is violation, then the people who complain have the right to complain and have the right to speak to their Congress and to have their Congress speak upon it.

Now, I have no charges to make. I have no proof to offer. I have not looked into the details of this matter closely enough to be prepared, I am frank to say, to point out any violations of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. I said to one of my friends on the committee that if I knew this amendment would be voted down I would still offer it, for I thought it was fair and right that it be put before the House and let both sides be brought out, and that if the things charged are not true, the fact that they are not true ought to be brought out, and the gentlemen of the committee ought to have this opportunity of bringing it out and letting it go into the RECORD.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. How many children are now being educated in these mission schools?

Mr. LOWREY. I do not know. I stated that I had made no investigation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The report of the commissioner just issued might give the gentleman a little light. That report states that in the mission schools, contract boarding and noncontract boarding, there are 6,328 Indian pupils now being educated, or one-tenth of all the Indian children being educated.

Mr. LOWREY. One of my objects was to bring out the facts.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman's interest in this matter has come to my attention I have made inquiry of the Indian Office and I am advised by the Indian Bureau that there is not at present one dollar expended from any gratuity item in this appropriation bill for the education of Indians in sectarian schools of any denomination. Not one dollar of the gratuity items is being expended in any sectarian school for the education of Indians. I am informed by the Indian Bureau that there is some amount expended from tribal funds for such purposes, but that that is not expended except upon the application of the Indians whose money is being used and in accordance with their application.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Just one further statement, if the gentleman will permit. That is the statement of the Indian Service as to the present situation. It is my understanding—the nature of their statement to me is such that I understand—that there is existing law which forbids their doing anything different from what they are now doing. I have not that law at hand and can not speak positively as to that, but I do speak positively as to the nature of their statement to me concerning the facts.

Mr. LOWREY. I just wanted to say that as I wrote the amendment originally I took notice of the very thing the gentleman mentioned, and of the right of the Indians to designate the use of this tribal fund.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is not the amendment that is now before us. The gentleman's amendment in its present form would forbid the use of the money belonging to Indians to educate their children in the schools where they want them educated. The amendment can accomplish no good purpose, because the thing that the gentleman fears does not now exist, and it would have a bad effect to adopt the amendment. I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In view of the fact that under the point of order a great part of the gentleman's amendment went out which he thought was necessary in order to make it a proper amendment, does the gentleman think that the amendment ought to be adopted in the form in which it is now offered?

Mr. LOWREY. I stand for my amendment as it now is. I wish it could have been adopted as I wrote it originally.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LOWREY) there were—ayes 14, noes 33.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers. All those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ten Members rising, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The amendment is rejected. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSION OFFICE.

SALARIES.

Commissioner, $5,000; deputy commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,500; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; 2 qualified surgeons, at $2,000 each; 8 medical examiners, at $1,800 each; 6 chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,250; chief of board of review, $2,250; 34 principal examiners, at $2,000 each; private secretary, $2,000; 10 assistant chiefs of divisions, at $1,800 each; 3 stenographers, at $1,600 each; disbursing clerk for the payment of pensions, $4,000; deputy disbursing clerk, $2,750; 3 supervising clerks in the disbursing division, at $2,000 each; clerks—3 supervising, at $2,000 each, 98 of class 4, 97 of class 3, 272 of class 2, 375 of class 1, 26 at $1,000 each; 2 copyists, at $900 each; 25 messengers, at $840 each; 10 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $660 each; in all, $1,384,520: Provided, That out of any unexpended balance of amounts herein appropriated a sum not to exceed $5,000 may be expended for the purchase of law and medical books and other books of reference.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the course of the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill there was some discussion of an item for the assistant in charge of editorial work, carrying a salary of $5,000. In response to a question I stated that it was my impression that this position was transferred from the lump-sum appropriation to the statutory roll. I gained that impression from a statement made by the Chief of the Division of Publications, which apparently was not intended to convey that impression. The fact was that this was a new position, the funds for which were obtained by a transfer of funds from another item to the statutory roll.

In connection with this discussion the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] made certain statements with respect to the person who was to occupy this position. I have just received a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to that statement, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be read by the clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the letter referred to may be read by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, December 27, 1922.

Hon. SYDNEY ANDERSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: I find on page 826 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 21 the following colloquy between yourself and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington:

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us come down to the point. I ask the question if it is not understood that the Secretary of Agriculture proposes to bring one of his editors from one of the farm publications to take a $5,000 job in his office?

"Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know. If it is true, I have no knowledge of it.

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will state that that is the proposition."

I wish to assure you that such a thought as bringing one of my editors to take a $5,000 job in this office never occurred to me. So far as I know, Mr. JOHNSON is the only person who has suggested such a thing. There is no reason why any Member of Congress should not criticize the work of this department or my administration of it in the freest possible manner; but it does seem to me most unfair that a Member of Congress should make such a statement on the floor as Mr. JOHNSON made in the foregoing without first having taken pains to ascertain its truth. His statement is utterly without foundation.

Very sincerely,

HENRY C. WALLACE.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph in line 18, page 70, at the end of the line, by striking out "thirty-four" and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-five." If there is no objection, I will couple with that a second amendment, on page 71, line 1, to strike out "ninety-eight" and insert "ninety-seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 70, line 18, at the end of the line strike out "34" and insert in lieu thereof "35," and on page 71, line 1, strike out "98" and insert "97."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph has been altered somewhat from the old language by two facts: First, when we provided for the monthly payment of pensions instead of the quarterly payment some additions to the force were created by the deficiency act last year, and those positions must be continued, adding somewhat to the paragraph. Also, there are 10 positions actually for the retirement section of the office carried on the Pension Office roll, and as their service is entirely for the retirement section the committee thought it better to have the retirement section carry its own force and get that straightened out, and that meant certain reductions; and in the course of that remodeling one of the positions so transferred from the pension roll to the retirement section was subtracted from the wrong item. The amendment I have offered decreases the number of clerks of class 4 and increases the number of principal examiners to correspond to the present situation of the regular force.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 70, line 22, strike out "$4,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. In connection with that I should state to the committee that this is the salary of the disbursing clerk for the payment of pensions. I noted in the committee print of the bill this amount $4,000, when previously it had been $3,000. No one misrepresented the fact to me, but I assumed that the change from $3,000 to $4,000 was simply carrying out an increase of salary given in the deficiency act last year. I was entirely to blame for the mistake. I thought it was so and I assumed that to be the case, and I so represented to the subcommittee and I think the full Committee on Appropriations. Therefore the $4,000 was carried, and it is only fair that I call attention to the situation. It was not the purpose of the committee to raise salaries, and while the gentleman may be entitled to $4,000, and that was what the position carried at one time, in the act of 1922, with which I had nothing to do, it was cut from $4,000 to $3,000. The figures I am offering will continue the salary of the gentleman that he is now drawing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk have authority to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Clerk have authority to correct the totals. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the committee out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there has just been read to the committee a letter from the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, in which he states that some remarks made by me on the floor three or four days ago, when the Agricultural bill was under consideration, were without foundation. I find in that portion of the debate which the Secretary quoted that I asked the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. ANDERSON] if it was not understood that the Secretary of Agriculture proposed to bring one of the editors of his farm publications here to take the new $5,000 position which the Agricultural bill was creating. The gentleman from Minnesota replied that he did not know, and I then said, "I will state that that is the proposition." Mr. Chairman, I realize that I should not have made that last statement without knowing it to be a fact. Therefore I feel that the Secretary of Agriculture was justified in sending this correction to the gentleman from Minnesota to be read to the House.

The point I was trying to make then and that I thought I had a right to make was this: That we were in the Agricultural bill creating a new division or bureau in the Department of Agriculture, and there was being created a $5,000 position, which is equivalent in pay to that of an Assistant Secretary of the various departments of Government; we were creating such a position in an irregular way, whereas other Assistant Secretaries are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. I was informed—I may be mistaken in my memory—that there was to be an editor brought here from one of Mr. Wallace's publications. If not from the Wallace publications, I was informed that the new position was to go to a man of ability from among Mr. Wallace's associates—perhaps not an editor, but a man to supervise the editing and distribution in certain portions of the Agricultural Department.

The Agricultural bill, as I undertook to show, carried various printing items. I asked for a count of votes, as far as I could, on several amendments, to show that the Committee of the Whole might not be in position to follow the situation throughout the bill. It was my purpose to show that printing and editing was being authorized in other branches and bureaus of the Agricultural Department entirely aside from the work of this newly created department with the new $5,000 official at the head of it. It is in the printed testimony that this job already exists, and that the $5,000 is paid from a lump sum. Every man who has watched the operation of the lump-sum appropriation in every department knows that that is where they play the tricks.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; pardon me, I prefer not to yield. What I wanted to do—and I do not want to continue the dispute—was to show that a position was being created and that a man was to be brought here and paid the salary of an Assistant Secretary. If the place is finally created, Mr. Secretary Wallace is entitled to and should bring the best man he can find. If the man is to be in the Secretary's office, he should be a friend and an adviser. My objection is to the method of making the place.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and his associates of the appropriations subcommittee for doing just what the House decided to do, and that is the combining of the printing items in each supply bill in one place, so that it is possible to see what printing is authorized and at what gross cost. The House wants to have the Agricultural Department have its printing—all that it legitimately needs—but when a plan which we have worked upon for years is brought to fruition we would like to have that plan continued.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I prefer not to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Bureau of Pensions to perform the duties imposed upon it by the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, including personal services, purchase of books, office equipment, stationery, and other supplies, traveling expenses, expenses of medical and other examinations, and including not to exceed $3,000 for compensation of two actuaries, exclusive of the Government actuary, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and actual necessary travel and other expenses of three members of the board of actuaries, $68,940: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,740 per annum except two actuaries and the following: One at $3,000, one at $2,400, three at $2,000 each, and three at $1,800 each.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 71, line 16, strike out the word "expenses" at the beginning of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the amendment.

Page 71, line 16, strike out the word "expenses" in the beginning of the line.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, pensions, for services rendered within the fiscal year 1924, $275,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 72, line 25, strike out the amount "$275,000" and insert "$192,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in support of that I will say that it is in accord with the later estimates of the bureau as to the amount that would be sufficient for the expenses of the office of examining surgeons in view of the passage of the Bursum bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, students of psychology say that one of the best ways to test whether or not a man sincerely believes a thing is to question him and determine whether or not he is showing any anxiety as to whether other people believe it. Recently there has been quite an interest taken in the study of psychoanalysis and autosuggestion. There are three well-known schools—the Freude, the Adler, and the Jung—and some people speak of the two schools—the Zurich school and the Nancy school. Of course, the great organ of this administration and its high-class writers naturally keep up with the times, and no doubt have indulged somewhat in the study of this new literature which seems to be the rage at the present time and is largely responsible for the success of the press agent who is telling us about the coming of the leader of the Nancy school, Doctor Coué.

The natural presumption is that the editors and the high-class writers of the Washington Post, the well-known administration organ, would imbibe some of the philosophy of one of these three schools. One of the most remarkable writers that the Washington Post has is the genial, the brilliant Sir Harry N. Price. Sir Harry, Mr. Chairman, is loyal to the administration. Sir Harry does not stop to debate the relative merits or the difference between the "functional" and the "mechanical" theory in psychoanalysis or whether he shall become a partisan of either the Nancy school or the Zurich school; but with that shrewdness which is characteristic of all his writings, he appreciates the advantage of confining his efforts strictly to the Coué method, and so he has decided in the task that has been allotted to him and the other special writers for this administration to convince the American people that the recently enacted prohibitive—not protective—tariff is a good thing and that it will not produce the natural result which all intelligent economists say that it will produce, and that even misguided Democratic orators in the last campaign had the temerity to predict.

Mr. Chairman, with that preliminary statement, you can understand the great joy, the very great pleasure and the appreciation with which I read an article on Wednesday morning last, written by that selfsame brilliant, charming newspaper writer, Sir Harry N. Price, in the Washington Post of that date, December 27, 1922. The article to which I refer is headed "Tariff seen as boon," and Sir Harry begins the article thus:

The Republican administration is entirely satisfied with the working of the new tariff law passed at the last session by a Republican Congress, and made an issue by the Democrats in the recent election, it was learned at the White House yesterday after the Cabinet meeting, at which the principal subject of discussion was foreign trade and exchange.

Mr. Chairman, one can always learn something from the great organ of the administration after a Cabinet meeting, and you can often find, Mr. Chairman, a new idea as to what really was in issue in the last campaign. I think I am the only statesman in captivity who has not suggested what was the issue settled in the last campaign. Each man has a different idea about it. But listen, Mr. Chairman, to these words of wisdom from Sir Harry, the officially recognized spokesman of the Republican Party on the subject of the new profiteers' tariff. Do not forget this significant statement. I read:

Under the new revenue act both imports and exports have been increased and are steadily increasing, it was said, both in money values and in quantity. Imports and exports are becoming more evenly balanced. This is the result of foreign countries paying more in goods than in money, which is helping to bring about a stabilization of foreign exchange and a balance of the world's gold supply.

Mr. Chairman, never had I expected a Republican to urge as a boon an increase in quantity of imports of foreign goods, as does Sir Harry in the article just read; but I say, evidently following the method of the celebrated Doctor Coué——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, because there is more of it and I want to be fair to Sir Harry. I am an admirer of his, and I do not want anyone to mistake this as a criticism. I think he is a past master.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, there are other suggestions offered, but do not forget that he said that one result of this profiteers' tariff is that there are more goods coming over from Europe than before the bill went into effect and that that is a beneficent thing. It is actually "helping restore the trade balance of the world," you will see if you read the whole article. He wants to throw out some other suggestions, as I say, following the Coué method of suggestion, that there are other beneficent things that flow from this wonderful tariff act, and he is talking about the other things that are contributing to the stabilization of American foreign trade, and, of course, this is but an enunciation of the achievements of the administration, circling and grouping around that major achievement, the enactment of this wonderful tariff law. Following the Coué method of suggestion, he says:

One of these is the activities of wealthy Americans who travel much abroad.

I did not know until I read Sir Harry that this administration had as a fixed policy encouraged rich Americans to travel abroad so as to help restore the parity of gold. He refers to "the parity" a little later on in his announcement of these wonderful achievements. I presume that there is the suggestion that under this beneficent tariff law there will be more wealthy Americans protected receiving the benefits of this wonderful law, and, there being more of them, there will be more of them to travel abroad and spend their money and thereby restore the balance, and that that will be an untold blessing to the toiling millions of American people, especially the laboring men, in whose behalf it was claimed this wonderful profiteers' tariff law was enacted. But, of course, any dissertation at this time would be a little bit "off" if it did not include the guiding genius of this administration, the good genius of this administration and the evil genius of the Wilson administration, Sir Herbert Hoover, so the article goes on—

Mr. Hoover reported, it is said, that arguments that the high duties of the new tariff would strangle imports so as to make it impossible for foreign countries to buy from America were controverted effectually by the facts. He held that the invisible exchange more than anything else made up the difference and that prosperity at home, helped by a protective but proper tariff, brings a reflex action in foreign trade.

Get that, my friends, and do not forget it, because Sir Herbert said it, and it must be true. He is another oracle of this administration. I have not time to read all of the article, but I want to read his suggestion about gold. I contend that Sir Harry is following the Coué method:

The buying power of European countries will be increased as their gold balances are increased and as they produce goods which can be sold in this country.

Oh, tell it not in Gath, Mr. Chairman, and whisper it not in the streets of Ascalon. The logic of that is that the prime object of this protective tariff law is to make wider the American market for foreign goods! A wonderful defense of this new tariff bill, a wonderful justification of its workings in one short month's time! But listen:

The gold movement is now at or near a parity. Settlements have been made for several months without shipments of gold to America, even in the settlement of interest on the foreign debt.

Now, listen to this. This is the wisest thing, and he saved it for the last:

Government economists feel that depreciation of foreign currencies will cease as soon as they begin to recover gold. As their currencies increase their buying power will increase. In addition, the more rapidly Europe produces or can pay in goods the less will be the necessity for Europe to send gold.

Oh, wonderful discovery! Nobody else had ever thought that a recovery of gold by these foreign countries was necessary to restore the international value of their currency and its purchasing power in foreign trade. But Sir Harry, the chief spokesman of this administration, offers as one defense and justification of this tariff bill the wonderful discovery, he thinks, that as long as these foreign nations get hold of the gold that we have cornered they will put it back of their currency, and their currency will increase in value. Then follows the logical conclusion that people should rise up and thank the Republican Party for this wonderful thing, this wonderful profiteers' tariff bill! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, referring to what I mentioned a few moments ago concerning the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY], I have now in hand the act in question, and knowing that the gentleman will be interested I will give the reference. In the appropriation act for the Indian Service for 1898, carried in Thirtieth Statutes, page 79, was this declaration:

And it is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government to hereafter make no appropriations whatever for education in any sectarian school.

Supplementing that, the gentleman will be further interested in a decision of the Supreme Court, volume 210, page 79, in the case of Quick Bear against Leupp, on page 50 of the volume, and on page 79 is this paragraph:

Since 1899 public moneys are appropriated under the heading "Support of schools," "for the support of Indian and industrial schools and for other educational purposes," without saying anything about sectarian schools. This was not needed, as the effect of the legislation was to make subsequent appropriations for education mean that sectarian schools were excluded in sharing in them, unless otherwise provided.

The gentleman now has the references, and can read them at greater length if he desires.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The commissioner's report states that 6,300 people were educated in mission schools.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. That is already in the RECORD, and I have made a statement in the RECORD as to the circumstances under which that was done.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. How much was appropriated for this education?

Mr. CRAMTON. One hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars. I did not bring this up to renew the discussion, but because I knew that gentlemen interested in this problem would be interested in the citation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Well, $300,000 would scarcely suffice to educate that many.

Mr. CARTER. There was $186,000 spent in the last fiscal year for contract schools, mission schools. The gentleman stated that some 6,000 Indian pupils were cared for in mission schools. That is true, but all but about 1,500 or 2,000 of those were cared for without expense to the Government, as I am advised by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the Government has no connection with those schools. Not all the expenses of those placed in these schools by the bureau are paid from these appropriations. A part of the expense of those over whom the Government does have supervision is borne by institutions that have no connection with the Government.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In the boarding schools what amount is allowed for each Indian?

Mr. CARTER. In the contract it is usually the lowest possible per capita.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I believe it takes about $100.

Mr. CARTER. No; usually about $160 or $170, or something like that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, when a court, in rendering a decision, uses language that is unnecessary in reaching the decision, that language is designated as "dicta" or "obiter dicta." A declaration of policy on an appropriation bill for a certain year, so far as subsequent years are concerned, is in the nature of dicta.

Now, this declaration of policy that was in the appropriation bill in 1898 is shown by the report of the Indian Commissioner, as read into the RECORD by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], not to have been followed. You can not escape the fact, because the report shows that there are over 6,000 Indian children, which is 10 per cent of them, in mission schools, and mission schools are sectarian schools.

Mr. CRAMTON. And if the gentleman had just listened to the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], he would know that three-fourths of those are not educated at Government expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I caught the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma, and it was correct, because he knows enough about the Indian situation to be able, whenever he makes a statement, to make a statement that you can rely upon. His statement was that of those 6,000 Indian children only about 1,500 are in schools that require the Government to pay part or all of their tuition, as I understand it.

Mr. CARTER. No; between 1,500 and 2,000 are being partially paid for by the Government, but the remainder are at no expense to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; that proportion only are partially paid for by the Government and the remainder are not at any expense to the Government. But that does not change the situation that over 6,000 Indian children are in sectarian schools just the same.

Mr. CRAMTON. And paid for by their own money.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us forget the payment. Let us forget about the money part of it. The whole contention is that these 6,000 Indian children are wards of the Government and that they should be in Government schools, and they should not be in sectarian schools as they now are, regardless of who pays the expense.

It does not make any difference whether we have to pay for them or not. I take it there are some religious denominations that will gladly take the Indian children into their own schools and educate them if we would let them and would imbue them with their own doctrines if we would let them, and that is why we must not let them. They are our wards and we should educate them in Government schools and not in any particular kind of religious doctrine to the exclusion of all others. So after all this declaration of policy expressed in 1898 has not been carried out, and the position taken by my distinguished friend from Mississippi, Doctor LOWREY, who by the way used to be at the head of one of our splendid educational institutions in the State of Texas, and we miss him there and we are sorry Mississippi has taken him from us, is eminently correct. I think he was right in his position. I think that his amendment ought to have been adopted because if it were right for the Congress in 1898 by way of dictum to place in the appropriation bill a declaration of policy, why is it not right now, where that policy has been disregarded by the Indian Bureau to the extent of 10 per cent of the Indian children? Why is it not right now to adopt the amendment of my distinguished friend from Mississippi and renew the declaration of policy and thus tell the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that when this Congress outlines a definite policy that the commissioner must follow it to the extent of 100 per cent and not violate it by placing 10 per cent of these Indian children in sectarian schools——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, as the chairman of the subcommittee rather addressed his remarks to me I ask for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LOWREY. I knew both the discussion in Congress to which the gentleman refers and this declared program. I remember well, and I was by no means in politics at the time, when that discussion was on in Congress, and that declaration of policy; and I have more than once been referred to this Supreme Court decision. I am frank to say that my resolution was introduced because in my opinion the policies therein declared have been disregarded in the administration of Indian affairs; perhaps not the letter of the policy, but certainly the spirit of the act and the spirit of the American Constitution and American principles; and therefore I believed that in connection with this bill, and do yet believe that in connection with this bill, there ought to have been a declaration to the American public, an assurance that the policies would not be wholly disregarded. Now, I fully appreciate the fact of these being tribal funds that are thus used. I wanted to put into my amendment permission to the Indian to use his tribal funds, or at least that his right should not be interfered with to use his funds to educate his children in the school of his choice, if he preferred a denominational school. But I did not, and I regret I did not get from this House a definite declaration of its policy in this matter. I believe the country wants this and will continue to demand that the American ideals of Government shall not be disregarded in the administration of educational work in connection with Indian affairs.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in 8-point type a speech that I delivered when the bill was under consideration last February.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona as indicated?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a speech delivered by myself last February on the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was under consideration at that time:

[Reprint of a speech by Hon. CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona, in the House of Representatives, Friday, February 10, 1922, when the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, since this bill carries the appropriations for the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian field service, I take this occasion to make some observations in regard to the Indian problem. That problem, to my mind, is principally one of salvage—to make the best we can out of the lives of the Indians who remain in the United States to-day—and its ultimate solution must be sought in developing among them an independent and self-sustaining citizenship.

The oldest and the easiest way to solve the Indian problem was to kill the Indian, a very simple and a very satisfactory solution, so far as the white people were concerned. That was the method adopted by my ancestors in New England and by yours in other parts of America. Later the policy was changed to one of driving the Indians out of parts of the country that white settlers desired. Thousands of Indians who originally lived in Georgia and Alabama, in Ohio and Kentucky, in Michigan and Illinois, and other sections of the eastern United States were moved west of the Mississippi River. As civilization and settlement passed on to the West, the reservation system was adopted, and the Indians were gathered together on tracts of land taken out of the public domain and set aside for their use.

It would be both vain and useless to consume time condemning or praising our ancestors for what they did to or for the Indians. What they did, they did, and the results lie before us. One side of the picture does not give us warrant to boast that justice and fair dealing have characterized the treatment that the people who first inhabited this country have received from the American Government.

The other side of the picture is much brighter. It shows tens of thousands of men, women, and children of Indian blood who in every way are so much in advance of their own grandfathers that their progress can only be characterized as astounding. In the same community there will be found men who have fought, killed, and scalped their enemies dwelling with their children and grandchildren, who live, act, and dress as their white neighbors do. Old warriors who, with painted faces and tactics of barbarians, fought the United States soldiers can be seen daily carrying their children's children to public schools in wagons.

I can remember as a small boy a tribe of Indians living near where I was born who went about clad in little more than a breechclout—naked, good-natured, friendly savages. To-day most of the members of the Pima tribe can speak English, have fairly comfortable homes, a number of them own automobiles, and practically all of them make as good use of the land that they have and the water supplied to them for irrigation as their white neighbors—a marvelous change within the last 40 years.

Millions of acres which but a few years ago were prairies ranged by buffalo hunters to-day are fertile farms cultivated by the sons and grandsons of these same Indians. Thousands of Indian children are attending schools maintained for them by the Government. Indian medicine men have been displaced in most tribes by white doctors with hospitals to which Indian patients are taken. Where once there was war between the red and white men, to-day there is more than peace—there is being successfully established the friendly communion of neighborliness.

Indians are bank presidents, judges, public officials, lawyers, teachers, doctors, actors, storekeepers, manufacturers, clerks, salesmen, trained nurses, artists, authors; in short, they are successfully making their way in all the commercial and professional branches. The real blanket Indians are the old full-bloods, too set in their ways to change. In another generation or two they will have become but a memory if a proper policy of education is pursued.

The march of progress has entirely wiped out of existence a number of tribes, but has carried forward other tribes on the road to civilization. The white men, first the conquerors and then guardians of the Indians, took to them whisky and rum, the greatest curses ever brought to a primitive people. They introduced diseases which carried away thousands of natives, but they have also given to the Indians schoolhouses, hospitals, modern farm machinery, better cattle, and many creature comforts of which the original Americans were totally ignorant. The balance is therefore not wholly against the white man, as many would have us believe.

The American public, as a whole, knows but little of Indians and its interest in them is less than its knowledge of them. To most white men and women the American Indian falls into two classes: Indians who are dissolute paupers and beggars, the recipients of Government rations and money which at once goes for drink, and Indians who are wealthy beyond dreams of avarice through their possession of oil fields, cattle, or timber. About all the average person knows of Indians is that they are something or other which the Government, in some way or other, is trying to do something or other for.

I should hesitate to risk asking the Members of this House the question, "What do you really know about the American Indians?" I should not like to disclose their lack of knowledge about the Government's wards, which can be sensed by anyone at all familiar with Indians who reads the debates in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on bills affecting the red men of our country. This kind of ignorance is responsible for much of the criticism, even abuse, which comes from many good people who think Uncle Sam is mistreating, enslaving, debasing, pauperizing, and otherwise wronging his Indian nephews and nieces. It also is at the bottom of many of the complaints from well-meaning people who think the Government is doing altogether too much for the Indians.

The Government departments having to do with Indians publish but little about them. The Bureau of Ethnology has issued an excellent series of bulletins, many of them beautifully illustrated, but they are technical in their nature. The trouble with the ethnologist is that he wants to keep the Indian in his old state; he is interested in describing the ancient tribal customs and is not concerned about modern conditions.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs issues an annual report containing a vast amount of information about the Indians as they are to-day and of the Government's relations with them and of its activities in their behalf. But it is a Government report—concise, statistical, and formal.

Many writers have published books and articles about the Indians, some of them intensely interesting and most valuable in an educational way. But nowhere can there be found a comprehensive presentation of the conditions, welfare, progress, and modern life of the American Indians. No one has brought together in a readable, easily understandable form all the data touching the present-day Indians and their affairs.

I have no intention of attempting such a task, but I have gathered some information which may serve to shed a little light upon this question. I can presume to speak upon it after 10 years' service on the Committee on Indian Affairs and also on account of the personal contact that I have had with the Indians of my State, where they comprise a material element in our population, there being more than 40,000 of them in Arizona, more full-blood Indians than in any other State in the Union.

THE INDIAN SERVICE.

Living in communities or scattered over wide areas in 24 States are thousands of men, women, and children who are wards of the Government. They are American Indians who by an act of Congress have been placed in charge of the Secretary of the Interior. By authority of law he delegates the administration of his guardianship activities to a commissioner who is the executive head of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. This branch of Government service is divided into two coordinating departments—the Indian Office in Washington and the Indian field service, which is composed of about 130 units known as agencies, reservations, nonreservation schools, hospitals, sanitariums for tubercular patients, and warehouses.

In the Indian Office in Washington are divisions or sections which have to do with the education, health, agriculture, industries, finances, irrigation projects, welfare, probate matters, forests, lands, and live stock of the Indians and their legal and social relations with their white neighbors. There is scarcely an activity of human endeavor that does not come within the scope of everyday work and administration of the Indian Bureau. It is a unique department of the Government; there is nothing else like it.

The Indian Service began under the War Department in 1789, and was later transferred to the Department of the Interior. Any Commissioner of Indian Affairs has my sympathy. He has a most perplexing and unappreciated job. He stands in the relation of father to the biggest family in the world, for he has direct, almost personal, supervision over the affairs of more than 200,000 men, women, and children who are spread over 24 States, who are members of more than 100 different tribes, whose habitations range from the Everglades of Florida to the mountains of Montana, from the northern timber belt to the deserts in the Southwest, from the rich prairies of the Middle West to the highly developed irrigation areas of the Pacific coast. Every reservation and every Indian on a reservation presents a problem.

Each day in the routine of his work the Commissioner of Indian Affairs must be something of an executive, an administrator, a business man, a school-teacher, a doctor, a lawyer, a banker, a farmer, a stock raiser, a forester, a miner, an oil man, an expert accountant, a missionary, a mentor, and a friend of man. The property of the Indians under his supervision has an aggregate value close to a billion dollars, and this property belongs to a people which is emerging from a condition of primitive barbarism. The Indians to-day represent every degree of civilization, ranging all the way from almost pagan savagery to men and women of refinement and culture.

To carry on the multitudinous activities of the Indian Service there are 5,502 employees, with a total pay roll of $4,493,041, an average salary of $817 a year. The Washington Indian Office has 256 employees, exclusive of the commissioner and assistant commissioner, with an annual pay roll of $340,750, or an average salary of $1,331. The superintendents, principals, teachers, and other employees in the school service number 2,443, with a pay roll of $1,742,498, an average salary of $713. The total personnel of the reservation and agencies number 2,394, having a pay roll of $1,796,205, making an average salary of $750 a year. The balance of the employees, including the field and investigation sections, irrigation service, allotment service, probate lawyers, experts, and warehouse force number 409, having a pay roll of $613,588, an average salary of $1,500.

It will be noted that the average salary of the employees in the entire Indian Service is but $817 a year, and this does not include the salary of the commissioner and assistant commissioner, which are but $5,000 and $3,500, respectively. I am reliably informed that the pay of the Indian Service employees averages lower than the pay of employees in any other Government department.

A proper salary reclassification bill, when finally enacted into law, should materially improve this situation, which admittedly needs improvement.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the Lehlbach classification bill does not contemplate taking care of those outside of the District of Columbia. The largest number of employees in the Indian Service are out of the District of Columbia. Something should be done for the men and women in this service.

Mr. HAYDEN. That bill lays down the principle of equal pay for equal service.

Mr. ARENTZ. If that should be consummated, it would be a good thing.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What does the gentleman mean by equal service, equal pay? How would you apply the principle?

Mr. HAYDEN. If one person be employed as a teacher under the Bureau of Education in Alaska, for example, doing a certain grade of work, and another person were doing the same work in the Indian Service in Arizona, I should say that the same pay should be given for the same service.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Take three concrete cases. Here is an appointment clerk receiving $4,[illegible]0 a year for handling a roll of 19,000 people. Here is another appointment clerk handling a roll of 67,000 people and another one handling a roll of 1,500 people. Like service, like pay. How are you going to distribute the salaries?

Mr. HAYDEN. The very statement of the case which the gentleman from Nebraska has made indicates that one of those men is doing much more work than either of the others.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I should like to carry that on in connection with the customs service, where you have, for instance, 50 people employed as liquidating clerks, some of them younger, some of them older, some of them inexperienced, relatively, some of them well trained. They are all liquidating clerks. Like service, like pay. Will you make the younger, the inexperienced, equal in salary with the man who is older and who has experience?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly I should not.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. How would the gentleman apply the rule?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman again states a case that answers itself. But to return to my subject. Complaint has been frequently made about not only the inefficiency but the narrow-mindedness of Indian Service employees. But why should any broad-gauge, energetic, and efficient man or woman stay in a service where the pay is so poor and the opportunities for advancement so limited? The only reason that there are not more drones and incompetents is that a considerable number, after entering upon this work and realizing its importance, have become imbued with a sincere desire to be helpful to the Indians. The earnestness of some of them even makes them fanatical, so that they honestly believe that in every dispute the Indian is always right and the white man always wrong, regardless of the merits of the controversy. It is only to this missionary spirit, however, that I can attribute the continued presence in the Indian Service of men and women of my acquaintance who I am sure could readily obtain a larger material reward for their time and efforts in other occupations.

THE INDIAN POPULATION.

The number of Indians in the United States is not exactly known. The United States census for 1920 gives a total of 242,959 as the Indian population in the United States, exclusive of Alaska; the 1910 census gave a population of 265,683, which would indicate a decrease of 22,724 Indians. But this decrease, as explained by the Census Bureau, is due to the fact that in the 1920 census the enumerators did not include as Indians a number of persons of Indian blood who were so much more white than Indian that they were enumerated as white people.

The 1921 annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows a total Indian population of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, as of June 30, 1921, of 340,838. This total includes 2,582 white persons who married into the Five Civilized Tribes—the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Chickasaws, and Choctaws—of Oklahoma and 23,405 freedmen who are the descendants of the negro slaves brought into Indian Territory by the Five Tribes when they were removed from their eastern and southern homes.

Eliminating the intermarried white and freedmen, the report of the Indian Commissioner would indicate that there are 314,850 Indians in the United States. Of this number, 23,735 are persons of Indian blood who are not under the supervision of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, leaving a total of 291,116 as representing the men, women, and children of Indian blood who are on tribal rolls or are under the supervision and care of the United States Indian Service.

An analysis of the statistics carried in the 1921 annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that of the 291,116 Indians who are under the supervision in varying degrees of the Government 165,031 are full bloods, 46,181 are mixed bloods with a larger proportion of Indian blood in their veins, and 79,904 are of one-half or less Indian blood.

There is an apparent difference of 48,157 between the 1920 United States census and the 1921 report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as respects Indian population in the United States. The greater part of this difference comes in Oklahoma. The census population of the Oklahoma Indians is given as 55,949. The Bureau of Indian Affairs figures are 93,494, showing a difference of 37,545. A large part of this difference is accounted for in the explanation given by the Census Bureau and the further fact that the population figure of the Five Tribes, as shown in the commissioner's report, is not a census total but is the original net enrollment which must be maintained as a basis for determining land ownership and heirship.

There is also a difference of 10,530 between the Indian Service and the census figures in Arizona, which, I think, can be explained by the fact that the census enumerators were so poorly paid in 1920 that they could not afford to travel long distances over the reservations and make an accurate enumeration, with the result that a large number of Indians in my State were not counted.

The following tables gives the figures of Indian population in the different States:

State.	Indian Service.	United States census.
Alabama	405	405

In 22 States all of the Indians are on reservations, or are attached to reservations, or are scattered Indians who are under the care of an agent. In 2 States part of the Indians are under Federal supervision and part are not, and in 24 States and the District of Columbia there are no reservations or agencies. This general statement must be modified by another statement to the effect that in the 22 States referred to there are many Indians who, having received patents in fee to their allotments, are full citizens and no longer are under Federal supervision. Many of them, however, having an interest in undivided tribal property, or being heirs of deceased tribesmen, are under the so-called supervision of the Indian Bureau, which in their cases is acting as trustee or administrator of an estate.

At the close of each fiscal year the agents and superintendents of the Indian field service report to the Washington office the number of Indians who are on the rolls of agencies or reservations; of Indians who live off reservations but are, in some degree, under the care and supervision of agents and of others who, in some respect, are related to the Government in its administration of Indian affairs.

The simple fact that an Indian may be carried on a tribal roll does not necessarily imply that he or she is a Government ward and under Federal supervision. Thousands of Indians who have become full citizens by receiving patents in fee to their property and all their funds, Indians who are free as any Member of this Congress, have their names on tribal rolls.

This apparent anomaly is easily explained by the fiduciary functions of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which, besides being an administrative bureau, is a large probate institution with tens of thousands of clients. It also is a big title and trust organization, acting as trustee and agent for tens of thousands of men, women, and children who happen to have Indian blood in their veins.

The tribal roll is the basis, the beginning, of title to Indian property; it is the official record to which heirs must go to prove heirship; it is necessary to keep up the tribal rolls for the determination of heirs, the disposition of probated property, and for the sale and lease of millions of acres of Indian-owned land. So long as there is tribal property in the form of land or money, or both, so long will tribal rolls be maintained, for every member of the tribe or the heir of a member has an interest in tribal property, even though he or she is a full-fledged citizen, and the unrestricted owner of an allotment with a patent in fee for the allotted land.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

An Indian reservation can be described as a tract of land set apart for the exclusive occupancy and use of Indians. This was the case in the beginning, but as white settlers moved into the Indian country reservations were opened for settlement. That is, the surplus tribal lands were sold, the proceeds deposited to the credit of the tribe in the United States Treasury, and held for disposition in the discretion of Congress. Such reservations are known as diminished reservations.

Some reservations were instituted through treaties; others by agreements ratified by Congress which had the effect of treaties; others were formed by Executive order of the President; and still others by purchase authorized by Congress. Practically all the Indian reservations in Arizona were created by Executive orders setting apart areas of the public domain for the use of the Indians.

There are over 200 tracts of land in the United States which fall within the reservation class. Some are tiny California rancherias of but few acres each, for a dozen or less families; others cover areas of millions of acres, such as the Navajo Reservation in northeastern Arizona and northwestern New Mexico, with an area exceeding 8,000,000 acres, which is larger than some States in the Union.

Considerably less than a hundred reservations have resident superintendents, whose business is to look after the affairs of the Indians on their several reserves. The 31 mission reservations, or rancherias, for example, are grouped into two jurisdictions, each with an agent. In New Mexico the 19 pueblos are divided into two groups, each with its agent. None of the New York reserves have a resident superintendent, but are under the rather theoretical supervision of an agent. There are some reservations which are such in name only, such as the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole reserves in Oklahoma, for they have been allotted, most of the allotments have been sold, and it is impossible in passing through them to distinguish Indian from white land.

A typical Indian reservation is in charge of a superintendent, who is a pocket edition of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in that he is face to face with almost all of the perplexing problems which confront the commissioner. His is a many-sided job. In the first place, he is held strictly accountable to the Government for all Government property, such as the agency and school plants, tools, implements, material, supplies, and cash. He also is accountable for all Indian property and money held in trust by him for the Indians. He is responsible to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the maintenance of law and order on the reservation. He is a special disbursing officer, and under bond, the premium of which he has to pay out of his meager salary.

The superintendent of an Indian reservation rests on no bed of roses. On one side of him is the Government, with its demand of 100 per cent accountability; on the other side are a score or more of employees living in an isolated community whose very isolation tends to develop petty jealousies and factional cliques; hundreds of Indians, each with his problem, demand, complaint, and request. He is subjected to frequent inspections and check-ups and at any time he is apt to have charges preferred against him by disgruntled employees, dissatisfied Indians, or white men who assert that they have not been treated fairly by him. These charges, if of sufficient importance, are investigated by the Indian Office and action taken when necessary.

If there is a boarding school on the reservation the superintendent has the task of feeding, clothing, doctoring, amusing, and educating a hundred or more young Indians fresh from the soil, many of whom, perhaps, can not speak English. He may have a hospital to look after, a large agency farm and herd, a Government sawmill, flour mill, machine shop, and other industrial plants.

If his Indians are allotted he must attend to leasing their allotments, if they are not farmed by the allottees. He sells their lands and must attend to the estates of deceased Indians. If the tribe owns timberlands whose timber is sold he must see to it that the white lumberman pays for the timber he cuts. This requires a close inspection of logging operations to see that every log is measured, that the trees are cut according to the contract and the regulations. If there are irrigable lands under ditch he must be an irrigation engineer as well.

And with all these duties he is required to encourage the Indians to farm their lands, raise live stock, cut hay, make gardens, prepare for the winter, to send their children to school, to improve their living conditions, and, in short, to get ready to take their places as full-fledged citizens when the time arrives for that consummation of the Government's purpose.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will it disturb my friend if I ask him a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly not.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In recent years they have been purchasing cattle for the Indians on these reservations; has that been a success?

Mr. HAYDEN. It might be called a financial success so far as the operation itself is concerned. The Indian Service has taken over from the persons who leased the grazing land on the reservations their grazing rights and supplied tribal herds. But no more meat has been produced on the range than before. The herds are usually managed by some white man employed to supervise the business. The profits have been deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians. The tribe receives this profit instead of the money formerly obtained by leasing the grazing land.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then the Indian does not handle the cattle, neither in building up the herd or in grading them?

Mr. HAYDEN. Usually all the work has been done under the supervision of a white man. I can not see that the Indian has been greatly benefited by that policy. At one time as much as $600,000 was annually appropriated to furnish tribal herds to the Indians, but that amount was gradually reduced until now practically no money is expended for that purpose.

Of course, it is better to spend money in buying live stock for the Indians, even if the cattle are not turned over to the individual Indians but remain the property of the tribe, than it is to issue rations to them. In some cases the increase from the tribal herds have been issued in lieu of rations.

I might say with respect to the establishment of the ration system that there was a good reason for it. President Grant during his administration sent out a commission composed of a number of Army officers to make a study of the Indian problem. They went over the various reservations, and on concluding their work figured up the cost of the maintenance of the Military Establishment in the Indian country and divided that amount by the number of Indians killed. It was discovered that over a period of years it had cost more than a million dollars to kill an Indian. The commission determined as a matter of business that it was better to feed the Indian than to kill him. That was the reason for the establishment of the ration system. I realize that it has pauperized many Indians and made them dependent on the Government, but its original adoption was a saving to the Government in dollars and cents.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman tell us something about the educational system under this bureau? Is it practical; has it accomplished anything?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am glad to answer the gentleman's questions.

Perhaps there is no better illustration of the inescapable complexities and unavoidable difficulties constantly confronting the Government in its efforts to help the Indian people along the road to self-sustaining citizenship than is furnished by the Indian Service school system. The Indian day schools, reservation boarding schools, and nonreservation boarding schools last year had a total enrollment of 23,847 pupils. A large proportion of these Indian school children could not speak English when they entered school. They came from homes where the parents knew little, if any, English.

A large number of these non-English-speaking pupils were young men and women 18 to 20 years old, who sat in classes with little children under 9 years of age. Most of this class of older pupils were in the day schools, of which there are 167, but many of them, because of unavoidable circumstances, were taken into the reservation boarding schools where, it is supposed, only children who have gone through the day schools can enter.

In the large nonreservation schools the children of tribes which are traditional enemies to each other are brought together. In these nonreservation schools the entire Indian problem of the Government is localized. In one such school, for instance, will be found children from 30 to 40 tribes differing widely in their racial characteristics, their home environments, their tribal customs, their prejudices and traditions, in aptitude and intelligence, and in their capacity for education.

The Indian day schools are scattered over reservations, taking the place, in their communities, of public schools. Some of them are so remote from any white center of population that practically they are isolated for months of the year. The day-school teachers are not only teachers but they also act as subagents, looking after the health and general welfare of the Indian families in their neighborhood.

I have always believed that these little Indian day schools, outposts on the frontier of civilization, are the most potent agencies the Government has to help the Indians emerge from their condition of ignorance and superstition and give them a start on the road of progress. These underpaid, isolated, and almost forgotten day-school teachers never have received the recognition by the Government which is their due. I am informed that the Indian Service has the utmost difficulty in securing men and women to fill these modest but all-important positions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I notice the committee has appropriated or reported in this bill an appropriation of $44,000 for an Indian school in Mississippi and for a number of things in connection therewith. It provides the position of a doctor and a matron. How are those employees selected?

Mr. HAYDEN. Through civil service. There is practically nobody in the Indian Service who does not have a civil-service status, except the commissioner and the assistant commissioner.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Now, in selecting the matron, what qualifications does she have to possess?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not familiar with the regulations of the Civil Service Commission governing such positions, but there are certain qualifications specified in an examination which they must take.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does the matron have to take the civil-service examination?

Mr. HAYDEN. Every such position is under civil service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The doctor also?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. May I ask you, Do these people have to reside on the reservation?

Mr. HAYDEN. They may take an examination in any part of the United States, and being appointed, are sent for service wherever the Indian Bureau directs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. They are required to remain on the reservation?

Mr. HAYDEN. And actually do. But I was speaking of the Indian day schools. The American people first became educated in the "little log schoolhouse," where the children attended, but lived at home. When they returned from school at night they told their fathers and mothers what they had been doing, and the whole family became interested in education. In most cases I think that it is a mistake to take young Indian children away from the reservations to school. By a hothouse process great improvement is apparently made in the nonreservation Indian boarding schools, but when the pupils return home they often go back to the blanket.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Gladly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am in thorough accord with the attitude of the gentleman from Arizona in reference to boarding schools being on the reservation. Will the gentleman kindly indicate what progress has been made in the plan to abandon these institutions which are scattered all over the country—as, for instance, those at Hampton, Va., and Carlisle, Pa.—and centralizing these activities in schools on the Indian reservations?

Mr. HAYDEN. No money is now being appropriated for Hampton Institute, and about three years ago the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa., was abolished. Some of the other nonreservation boarding schools have been closed, one or two of the smaller ones.

I am sure that the gentleman will find that the Indian Bureau is now of the opinion that greater stress should be placed upon the Indian day schools wherever they can be established. Where additional boarding schools are necessary, they should be located on the reservations as near as possible to the fathers and mothers of the Indian children. It would be poor economy, however, to at this time abandon a number of the large nonreservation boarding schools which, although not properly located, nevertheless represent an investment of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, which can be utilized with some measure of success in educating the Indians.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any statistics to show how many of these Indians exercise the right of citizenship and vote?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no information as to that. None of them vote in Arizona, but in a great many of the States where their property has been given to them in severalty the Indians exercise all the rights of citizenship.

Mr. WALSH. Then most of the competent Indians exercise the right of suffrage?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman state in reference to the grades how high they go in the grades?

Mr. HAYDEN. Instruction in the ordinary day school on an Indian reservation extends to what is equivalent to about the sixth grade in the public schools. The Indian boarding schools in many cases educate small children through all the grades.

But the nonreservation boarding school is usually an industrial school, where half the time is devoted to instruction in farming and learning trades. Great stress is being placed upon the industrial features, which is entirely proper.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What is being done with reference to the future of these Indian boys and girls who have been graduated from the schools and colleges?

Mr. HAYDEN. It works out in this way: When the first generation of children have been taken away from the reservation and sent to a nonreservation boarding school and they go home and find that their fathers and mothers were never contented when they were gone, out of respect for their parents they are liable to lapse back into the tribal ways and customs. I talked with an Indian day-school teacher on the Navajo Reservation two years ago, who told me about 60 Navajo children that were sent to his school. Most of them came in like a lot of little wild burros, gathered together by the Indian police. They did not want to be there and had no idea of what it was all about. Among them were three children whose parents had been to an Indian school in their time, and he said that those three children by their conduct stood out above all the others. He said that their fathers and mothers had told them what the school was for and what they were expected to do, so they came willingly. He believed that it would take at least another generation to teach the fathers and mothers, forcibly in a degree in the first instance, to understand what education means. They tell their children, who are of the second generation, about it and the problem will be practically solved in the third generation. That will end the complaint that on the face of things a large amount of money has been expended on Indian schools with little apparent benefit, because in many instances the pupils go back to the old tribal ways on the Indian reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Does the gentleman know whether it is still the policy of the Indian Bureau to send Indian police to capture the children and to carry them perhaps a thousand miles to some Indian institution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indian Service, so far as I know, has rarely adopted the policy of using force in securing pupils for these schools. Much persuasion is ordinarily used, accompanied by a small measure of force. That is the only way to get the Indian children into the schools.

Mr. LAZARO. What do they teach the Indian pupils at these boarding schools? Do they teach them manual arts?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The appropriations for reservation and nonreservation boarding schools are made on a basis of $225 per pupil a year where the attendance exceeds 200, and $250 where it is below 200. This per capita is appropriated to cover the entire expense of educating, lodging, and boarding a pupil for one school year. When the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration in the House last year a Member inquired how it was possible to lodge, feed, clothe, educate, and care for a child for one year for $225. The answer to that is that the children in a Government boarding school practically work their way through the school. As an illustration of this I will cite one of the largest nonreservation schools which last year had an average enrollment of over 800 Indian boys and girls, and in which, as in all nonreservation schools, industrial and domestic training is an essential part of the educational work. The girls are taught the domestic sciences, poultry raising, gardening, and nursing. Boys are taught all the mechanical arts, agriculture, dairying, raising live stock, and fruit growing.

The girls make practically all of their own clothing. A sewing teacher and two assistants, the only paid employees in the sewing room, with the help of the girls, not only make dresses, aprons, and other articles of female clothing, but towels, pillowcases, and bedspreads for an institution which has more than 800 pupils. The tailor and one assistant, with the help of the boys in his class, not only do all the mending but make clothing, cut down suits for larger boys to fit the smaller boys, and in general do all the work which a tailoring establishment does. In the shoe and harness shop one instructor, with the detail of Indian boys, keeps in repair the shoes of all of the children and the harness for the working animals.

The hospital has one paid nurse; the student nurses provide the assistance necessary for the care of the sick. The entire laundry work for this establishment is done by Indian girls, under the supervision of one laundress and an assistant. The dormitories have one matron for each building, who merely supervises the work and teaches the students. The boys and girls take care of their rooms and dormitories, doing all the cleaning, bedmaking, and scrubbing.

The steam and electrical plant is in charge of an engineer and two assistants, the only paid employees. These men teach steam and electrical engineering and, with the boys detailed to that department, operate the entire plant, the ice-making machinery, look after the water and sewer systems, making all repairs, and do much new construction.

The carpenter shop has one carpenter and an assistant, who, with the boys detailed to the carpenter shop, keep in repair all the buildings of this institution. During the last 10 years the improvements that have been made by the boys in its industrial departments could not be duplicated with outside labor for $10,000 a year, according to the report of the superintendent. About a year ago the boys of the industrial department built a gymnasium, with an actual cost to the Government of $8,000. It is estimated that if this gymnasium had been built under contract it would have cost at least $30,000.

In addition to this the boys in all of the nonreservation schools are putting into practice what they have learned of farming, dairying, stock raising, and gardening so successfully that the products of school farms, gardens, dairies, and herds go a long way toward supplying these large schools, each with its hundreds of students, with all their vegetables, milk, butter, eggs, poultry, fruit, and meat. It is this that enables the superintendents of the schools to pull through on the per capita payment provided by Congress.

The children in the boarding schools are in their academic classrooms for about half of the day. Long before they go to their classes they have swept and cleaned the dormitories, halls, porches, and grounds; have made up their beds, have helped the cooks in the kitchen prepare the breakfast, and have washed the dishes afterwards, and many of them in the cold months have arisen before daylight to milk the cows and care for the horses, pigs, cattle, and poultry. The Indian students in the Government schools have no sinecure. Almost every minute of their day is occupied with useful work, recitation, and study. I know of no educational institution for white children where the day's program is more closely adhered to.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Do they carry the scholastic instruction of the pupils beyond the sixth grade?

Mr. HAYDEN. The curriculum in these schools is adapted to the needs of the Indians and the parallel with the public-school system can not be closely drawn in regard to grading the pupils. If it is an industrial school, at least half of the time is devoted to teaching the pupils to do something with the hands, which, I think, is of more importance than mere book learning. They ought to learn how to speak the English language and read and write sufficiently well to engage in business. When that much is accomplished, I think that under the present circumstances we should be satisfied, considering the fact that when they first come to the schools most of the Indian children know nothing whatever of the English language.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Do the majority of the Indian pupils that go to nonreservation schools return to the blanket condition afterwards?

Mr. HAYDEN. The statement can be safely made that up to this time the majority of them, after having been to school and having gone back to the reservation, could not be distinguished from those who have not been to school. From their appearance one could not tell whether they had been to school or not. But it does not depend on the kind of hat an Indian wears or the style of blanket he uses. If he has been to school, he has ideas in his head, and as the father of a family he impresses these ideas upon his children by teaching them the value of education. Through that process we can ultimately hope to make good citizens out of most of the Indians.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is it the gentleman's experience and observation that it is inadvisable to have them attend nonreservation schools?

Mr. HAYDEN. My experience has been that while the instruction received at the day schools sometimes does not appear on its face as of the best, yet more lasting results are actually obtained. Boarding schools, if established, should be located as near as possible to the homes of the Indian children rather than to send them far away from their relatives and friends. It is necessary, however, to utilize the facilities that the Government has provided. For instance, there are now on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona over 5,000 children for whom no schools exist. They are growing up in ignorance of the English language and civilized ways of living. They should be forced, if necessary, to attend school. That is the only avenue of progress for them, and the nonreservation boarding schools should be utilized to the fullest extent in their education.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. How far, or to what grade, is it compulsory? How far is the compulsory part of it actually carried?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs gathers up the Indian children as best he can. In my State he would have authority under the compulsory school law to force the Indian children into schools. I do not see why the same laws should not apply to the Indian as to the white children with respect to compulsory education.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman is so familiar with the subject that I wish to ask him a question for information. What is the effect of civilization upon the health of the Indians in general?

Mr. HAYDEN. A civilized man realizes that he can not live down in the dirt; that there must be fairly sanitary conditions surrounding his cooking and about his home. When Indians who have been used to sleeping out of doors and to having the whole world to roam over are crowded together and forced to do things apparently in the white man's way the resulting congestion has often led to the spread of diseases that have caused a great many Indians to lose their lives. The Indian medical service has improved greatly in the last few years, particularly along the lines of sanitation. I am sure that the statistics will bear me out in saying that the Indians are not decreasing in numbers as they formerly were.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my good friend from New York.

Mr. KINDRED. I have had the privilege of seeing a great deal of the Indians in the gentleman's district. I was very much interested in the question asked by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] as to the influence of civilization, generally speaking, on the Indians as well as upon the black race. I believe it is conceded that there has been a rapid development of tuberculosis among the Indians and also among the Negro race since what we call civilization has partly embraced them.

I want to ask the gentleman another question, on a subject which I was interested in a few years ago; that is, in the school conditions which the gentleman has so well described in his own State. Is there much interference with the Indians going to school, caused by eye diseases?

Mr. HAYDEN. There has been much difficulty on account of trachoma among the Indian tribes all over the United States.

Mr. KINDRED. That is what I particularly referred to.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the Indian medical service is doing all that it can to eradicate that disease, and I understand with considerable success.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. In connection with what the gentleman stated a moment ago, the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that the number of births among the Indians last year was greater than the number of deaths, showing that they are not now decreasing.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes more.

Mr. HAYDEN. When some legislation relating to the Indian Service was under discussion last year the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] made some observations relative to the Indian Bureau which I thought at the time were based upon misinformation, but it may be interesting to him to know that his remarks met with a measure of approval from a very good friend of mine in Arizona. I want to read an extract from a letter which he has written to me, not only for that reason but because I am sure that what he says will be read with interest, and I hope with profit, by those in the Indian Service who are broadminded enough to realize that there is a white man's side to the Indian question and that justice can not be done if they continually insist that the Indian shall always have the advantage of every situation. My friend says:

> I was much interested in the House debate of August 4 on the Indian appropriation bill. Personally, I am much in accord with Representative KELLY. I am firmly of the belief, judging from the experience and knowledge I have of Indian agents and other officials, that the great aim of the Indian Service is to perpetuate itself. I also agree with you that isolated instances of overzealousness or bureaucratic tyranny do not prove any case.
> You point out in your speech the need for road building on the reservations. That need is actual. Our eastern cousins, who imagine the red man to be a statue of bronze, should attempt to drive an automobile through some of our Indian reservations. I think their Indian idealism would drop from them like a winter's cloak. The reservations include practically 90 per cent of the trout streams in Arizona. The best camping in the State is to be found within their confines. It is the vacation ground par excellence of the people of the State. Yet we see agency superintendents exercise power that keeps every white man from "lighting" there except to fill his radiator or his gas tank.
> I am reliably informed by old-time white settlers on and near the reservations that the Indians will deliberately set fire to the forest to get work in putting it out. Moreover, it sounds quite unreasonable that the Indian reservations should be closed when the adjoining Forest Service lands are left open. State laws relating to game and fish prevail upon the forest reserves. Not so upon the reservation. Here the word of the superintendent is the word of God. He is the dictator—the court of last resort—for the Indian. He is the incarnation of the worst of bureaucracy. He is a product of that system. That it affects the people of Arizona so harshly is what hurts. Poor Lo, as you know, is the favored son of Arizona. He has practically a strangle hold on much of its best land, and a white man can be kept off at the whim of a superintendent.
> Really, Carl, the Indian reservations in Arizona are little principalities, occupying space in the State to the detriment of most of the people, and owing allegiance to all intents and purposes to a gentleman who sits in Washington and whose one great desire is to see the work perpetuated ad infinitum.
> As the State grows in population the ever-increasing problem, or one of them, will be the Indian reservations. The rights of the people of the State should be protected on these reservations. The Indian has rights, of course, but sentimentalists in the East apparently would approve of a course that forced the white man into Sonora and the placing of the good acres of the Salt River Valley at the disposal of the poor Apache.

What I have just read is typical of many complaints that I have received relative to the administration of Indian affairs. They come from men who represent the civilizing spirit of America and to whom the lack of progress among Indians is an abomination. When they see great natural resources, which if utilized at all are not fully used, tied up by the reservation system their every instinct calls out for development. To hold these lands back, awaiting the time when the Indians may make a higher use of them, is undoubtedly wasteful and a great burden upon the States wherein the reservations are located.

Take the State of Arizona, for example. It is true that we have had a greater proportionate increase in population than any other State during the past decade, but after all it can not be expected that taxation will be light when all the elaborate machinery of a modern State government must be maintained and paid for by only a little over 300,000 white people. We have unlimited faith in the future, but when it is realized that title to over one-half of the entire area of the State is in the Federal Government, of which over 20,000,000 acres are held for the benefit of Indians, one can readily understand, as my friend has indicated, how this question of the untaxed lands under Federal control is of vital importance.

That is why the citizens of my State greeted with unanimous approval the announcement that Congress has at last provided that no more Indian reservations can be created by Executive order and why they look askance at any proposal, however pleasingly presented, to establish additional Federal reserves of any character. If the friends of the Indians insist that the present reservations shall be maintained they at least owe it, in all fairness, to the white people of the West who are bearing the burden of State building to aid us at all times in obtaining assistance from Congress for road construction, irrigation projects, and every other form of development in the Indian country.

So long as a considerable number of those connected with the Indian Service maintain a policy of doing little or nothing in cooperation with the white people of the States where these reservations are located, when by their actions they indicate that they believe that the Indians should be isolated and that they will be contaminated by contact with white people who reside near the reservations, then expressions of the kind that I have read may be expected to be repeatedly made by good citizens who feel outraged whenever they come in touch with the representatives of such a bureaucracy.

OBSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM.

There is another and totally different variety of criticism to which the Indian Bureau is subjected that is both unjust and obstructive, and with which I have no patience because I doubt the honesty and good motives of those who indulge in it. Perhaps what they say and do is unworthy of attention, but unless these harmful activities are openly discussed anyone seeking light on the Indian problem is sure to be misled and confused. I shall not attempt to cover the whole field, because if serious heed were given to all of the various theories and preachments offered for directing the affairs of the Indians legislation would be often suspended and administration would function with difficulty.

It must not be overlooked that some of the best people in the world are trying by individual and organized effort to improve the condition of the Indians. There are many associations, both religious and secular, that are actuated by the highest motives for Indian welfare, whose activities are essentially in harmony with the general aims of good administration and whose suggestions and criticism are offered from time to time with sincere and helpful purpose. These forces are worthy of real appreciation because they represent men and women of deep sympathies, of hopeful vision, and of practical judgment. These are social factors in our great country whose influence rings true.

On the other hand, we find the spurious, the imitators, the pseudo reformers masked behind pretentious federations and cooperative associations, which are usually controlled by some one-man functionary, who, as chief grand counselor or attorney in fact for all the Indians he can hoodwink into his following, promotes his ulterior designs under the guise of philanthropy. This type of Indian friend and adviser is instanced by a certain agitator, who, after years of meddlesome scheming to gain recognition by the Indians of his State, succeeded in having about 50 of their number with himself indicted by the Federal grand jury on the charge of conspiracy to obstruct and impair the Government in the exercise of its proper functions and of conspiring to commit an offense against the United States in attempting to alienate from the Government the confidence of certain Indians. Whatever clemency is due these deluded and entrapped Indians will no doubt be accorded, and it should be equally certain that exact justice is meted out to the one who is responsible for their plight.

The too frequent misfortune of the innocent-minded Indian is the shifty trickster who "organizes" with a constitution and by-laws that seem to breathe benevolence from every syllable and then goes to the Indians in the pose of a haloed savior with an alluring message that there is great wealth in store for them at Washington, or that millions of acres of land, or the value of it, can be recovered to them through his influence and management if they will just "sign on the dotted line," pay membership fees to his organization, and defray his expenses to the National Capital, with like expenses of a retinue of Indians to give scenic effect to his mission. Instances are of record where Indians with no money beyond their most frugal daily needs have been approached in such manner as to be impressed that they could not share in the benefits of such a great enriching scheme unless they contributed with others an annual fee for financing it, and in order to secure the fabulous returns promised have virtually taken bread from the mouths of their children and reduced their families to the verge of destitution.

Perhaps more effectively harmful to the Indians are the fulminations of persons having some literary standing, who are able to present their views and criticism in such form and temper as appeal to the dispassionate reader, and who lighten their dark descriptions with the glamour of sincerity. A sinister disturber of this stamp has recently gotten into the magazines and syndicate news with a doleful picture of conditions among the Blackfeet Indians. His allegations include charges that fee patents to land have been forced upon these Indians against their will, that by outrageous robbery a trader has acquired about 400 of such patents, that last winter no bacon was issued with Indian rations, that one family actually starved to death, that $25,000 appropriated for rations was spent in constructing an automobile road for the whites, that the Indians were unable to get wood for fuel, and that not one-tenth of their crops planted were harvested. These and other implied calamities were found to be gross exaggerations, and in some instances wholly groundless.

To spread broadcast in civilized communities and among the Indians themselves such a declaration of appalling destitution and maladministration, fabricated as it was out of exceptional instances, hearsay, distortion of fact, and fancy fed by love of the limelight and mercenary returns was not only an invitation to many self-supporting Indians to become idlers and beggars but it was a slander against the Indian Bureau and an affront to the Congress under whose authority that bureau functions. It becomes a menace not easily ignored when such clever and bold characters, while making their living by misrepresenting the true attitude of the Government toward the Indians and the real condition of the Indians themselves, are planting the seeds of a morbid sentiment among whites and of ignorant resentment among Indians.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Does not the gentleman think that some benefit might be derived on behalf of the Indians in cases where complaints are made to refer them to some one to investigate other than a person in the department interested in the result?

Mr. HAYDEN. That would be highly desirable, but Congress can not investigate every charge that is made. That is an Executive function. Under the law the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are authorized to go outside the civil service and select inspectors of their own choosing who are their eyes and ears and whose duty it is to truthfully report the actual facts to the department. If we can not rely on the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to select competent inspectors who will make honest reports I do not know what we can do. Congress has provided ample appropriations for the inspection service to get at the actual truth about the condition of the Indians.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I was prompted to ask the first question by a concrete case where, I think, there was a just complaint against the Indian agent. They referred the complaint right back to the person himself who reported that he was 100 per cent right.

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly there are inspectors enough in the Interior Department so that it was not necessary to do that.

Among other retarding elements to both legislation and administration are a few mixed bloods who have learned some of the white man's vices and trickery with a little of his honesty and integrity. They are capable enough to be of some assistance to uneducated Indians and shrewd enough to give this aid in order to gain confidence and a following, but are unscrupulous in pushing their larger and selfish designs. It will be recalled that one of this class a few years ago submitted to a congressional committee a list of about 160 Indians who were said to have died on a northwestern reservation from lack of sufficient nourishment. It has since been proven that over 100 of these same Indians are living to-day and that only 12 died within the entire period covered by the false report.

In this vexatious group are also certain individuals who have managed to identify themselves with some missionary enterprise or lecture bureau, and whose social status is indicated more by an artful array of paint, feathers, and trappings than by any evidence of Indian blood in their veins, but who get an audience among many intelligent people and are able to denounce the Indian Bureau and the Government for maintaining it with enough platform accomplishments and grace of diction to carry some weight. These speakers sometimes secure the adoption of ready-made resolutions by civil or social welfare organizations indorsing their plausible sophistries without serious investigation. Their representations are largely based on exceptional, accidental, or unfortunate instances and not on total results or a comparison of Indian conditions by such periods of time as is necessary in estimating human progress anywhere.

And last but not least among the disturbers are a group of professional claims attorneys who have kept alive a large number of fraudulent Indian claims and year after year seek to obtain money from the Indians in payment for their alleged assistance. I am glad to say that within the past week the Committee on Indian Affairs has submitted adverse reports on two bills authorizing money to be paid out of tribal funds to lawyers of this character who had rendered no real or substantial service to the tribes, but whose activities have, in fact, been detrimental to them. I hope that this action by the committee will serve as notice to all such attorneys that Congress does not intend to give further consideration to bogus Indian claims.

In conclusion, let me say that I hold no brief for the Indian Bureau. I realize its shortcomings, the chief one of which is a lack of courage to do impartial justice where the Indians are clearly in the wrong. Too often the officials of the bureau, through fear of criticism, adopt the easy expedient of saying that they are merely the attorneys for the Indians and have no further responsibility than to protect the interests of their clients, regardless of the effect upon the community in which the Indians reside. Such a policy is most unsound, because it fails to recognize the fundamental fact that the Indians and their white neighbors have much in common and that only by proper cooperation can both races prosper.

The best way to attain a spirit of mutual helpfulness is to know the conditions under which those with whom we should work in harmony are compelled to labor. It is with that idea in mind that I have submitted these remarks, and I hope that the facts which I have presented here will aid a little in a better understanding of the Indian problem. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reindeer for Alaska: For support of reindeer stations in Alaska and instruction of Alaskan natives in the care and management of reindeer, $10,000, to be available immediately: Provided, That the Commissioner of Education is authorized to sell such of the male reindeer belonging to the Government as he may deem advisable and to use the proceeds in the purchase of female reindeer belonging to missions and in the distribution of reindeer to natives in those portions of Alaska in which reindeer have not yet been placed and which are adapted to the reindeer industry.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the paragraph just read we are providing that the Commissioner of Education shall conduct the reindeer stations in Alaska—sell the male reindeer and make disposition of the female reindeer, and so on. I have never been able to understand why this reindeer proposition should be embraced in the Bureau of Education and not be in the Agricultural Department. There is another thing I want to call attention to, and that is the inconsistency of appropriations. The distinguished gentleman from Washington the other day, Mr. JOHNSON—there are so many distinguished gentlemen from that State that I must designate him—is chairman of the Committee on Printing, and I wish all of the membership of the House had made a sufficient investigation to know what I know about his work on that committee. His committee has been instrumental in reducing the force of employees to a great extent; it has been instrumental in bringing about economies, retrenchment, and reduction in the expense which is almost phenomenal; and if the membership knew how far his committee had gone in that respect and what is now contemplated, I think that the entire membership would commend him. He was on the floor the other day and called attention to the fact that we were providing for a position of editor in the Agricultural Department with a salary at $5,000, some at $4,000, some at $3,500, and some at $3,000, and so on down. He called attention to the fact that the salaries to these editors was out of line.

Now, I want to call attention to what we provide for the editor in the educational department, the Bureau of Education, of this great Government. On page 75, line 18, "editor at $2,000." This $2,000 is the editor of our great Bureau of Education. I wish you would turn to the Agricultural bill, to the section the distinguished gentleman from Washington was attacking the other day, and with reason, and you will see there are numerous editors in that department who are drawing over double what the editor in the great Government Bureau of Education is drawing.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is the gentleman not aware that it takes a special education to make an editor of an agricultural paper?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the education of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education, Doctor FESS, embraces not only a general education but also that of many specialists, and to that extent the editor of the Government Bureau of Education ought to be an expert in many lines, while the editor in the Agricultural Department is an expert in only one particular line. I do not think that argument has any force or weight at all. I think the distinguished gentleman from Washington was correct. But, not being a member of this subcommittee of five, and not being a member of this great organization of 35 growing autocrats, whom I follow with my vote and back them up on almost every proposition when sane economy may be effected; because the gentleman is not one of the autocratic 35, they will not consider his suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. This paragraph that is pending relates to reindeer.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I know, but I was jumping from one ridiculous paragraph to another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman has talked for three days about half the time, and I was wondering if he was going to discuss the bill or talk about the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a pertinent question from the assistant whip of the House who, I understand, is ambitious.

Mr. BEGG. I think the assistant whip of the House has been very derelict in his duty for the past three days.

Mr. BLANTON. It happens so seldom that the assistant whip is not doing the talking that it may now be out of line for some one else to attempt it.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in good humor and I will not retaliate. I could force the assistant whip to send out all over the United States and bring in his absent Republican Members.

Mr. BEGG. He would find more Democrats absent than Republicans.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not agree to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECLAMATION SERVICE.

The following sums are appropriated out of the special fund in the Treasury of the United States created by the act of June 17, 1902, and therein designated "the reclamation fund," to be available immediately:

For all expenditures authorized by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law and all other acts under which expenditures from said fund are authorized, including salaries in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; examination of estimates for appropriations in the field; refunds for overcollections hereafter received on account of water-right charges, rentals, and deposits for other purposes; printing and binding, not exceeding $30,000; law books, books of reference, periodicals, engineering and statistical publications, including their exchange, not exceeding $1,500; purchase, maintenance, and operation of horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; payment of damages caused to the owners of lands or private property of any kind by reason of the operations of the United States, its officers or employees, in the survey, construction, operation, or maintenance of irrigation works, and which may be compromised by agreement between the claimant and the Secretary of the Interior; and payment for official telephone service in the field hereafter incurred in case of official telephones installed in private houses when authorized under regulations established by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if he will give us the information relative to the provision found in line 2 on page 80, where all of this money is made immediately available.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is in accordance with the practice heretofore in order that the work can be done in the field beginning the 1st of July and extending into the fall. It is more economical in an engineering way and an operating way to have each season by itself.

Mr. RAKER. What is the object of including the Salt River, Ariz., here?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman from California will permit, I can answer his question. The appropriation of $5,000 is made in order that what money is necessary may be expended by the Director of the United States Reclamation Service in seeing that the project is properly kept up. There is a contract between the Salt River Valley Water Users Association and the Secretary of the Interior whereby the association agrees to pay all the expenses of an annual examination of the project, which may amount to as much as $5,000. Whatever the expense it is paid for by the association so that the reclamation fund is immediately reimbursed.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, this project which cost them $10,000,000 has been so far completed that it has been turned over to the people in that community under the project, and they are paying up their annual assessment of the cost of the construction as well as each year the maintenance and upkeep of the project?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; but so long as there is money due to the United States from the water users of the Salt River project certainly it is entirely proper that the Reclamation Service make annual inspections to see that the engineering and other work is carried on properly so that the works of the project do not deteriorate. That is the purpose of this appropriation.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, while this does not say reimbursable, this $5,000 goes back to the Government from the Salt River project.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; the water users have contracted to pay all of the expense incurred any year by the United States in making these investigations, and they do repay immediately.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman can state to the committee that within due course, within proper time, under the contract, under the law, this entire amount of money will be returned to the Government of the United States for reinvestment in other projects.

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, there is no question about that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Uncompahgre project, Colorado: For operation and maintenance, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $185,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out on page 81, line 12, the word "Uncompahgre."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 81, line 12, strike out the word "Uncompahgre."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the word "Uncompahgre" is an Indian word, the meaning of which no white man this day understands.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that there may be a good many English words in the bill that a great many white people do not understand.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but I was merely suggesting the various paragraphs in the bill whose inconsistency many can not understand when I was interrupted by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. The paragraph in this bill which provides that the Government educator, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Education, shall handle the reindeer in Alaska, shall sell the male reindeer and likewise dispose of the female reindeer, is a proposition which no man in this House and no one else can understand.

I was about to say that our distinguished friend from Ohio, Doctor FESS, is the chairman of the Committee on Education, and therefore should have had jurisdiction over this reindeer provision. But that is no more beyond the pale of understanding than the other proposition contained in this bill which pays the editor in this Bureau of Education only $2,000, while the Agricultural bill pays an editor in another department of the Government two and one-half times that much. My whole purpose was to commend the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] for the effort he attempted the other day to reconstruct these propositions with some idea of consistency, and I hope that when the committee next year frames the Agricultural bill they will listen to the gentleman and pay some attention to his wise suggestions.

Mr. Chairman, as my amendment was merely pro forma, I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Minidoka project, Idaho: For operation and maintenance, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, with authority in connection with the construction of American Falls Reservoir, to purchase or condemn and to improve suitable land for a new town site to replace the portion of the town of American Falls, which will be flooded by the reservoir, and to provide for the removal of buildings to such new site, and to plat and to provide for appraisal of lots in such new town site, and to exchange and convey such lots in full or part payment for property to be flooded by the reservoir, and to sell for not less than the appraised valuation any lots not used for such exchange, $665,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the language found in line 3, page 82, down to and including the word "exchange" in line 12. Will the gentleman from Michigan please explain that?

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the point of order?

Mr. RAKER. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Last year a point of order was made to that language and certain language was stricken out. The situation is not necessarily the same this year as it was last year. The evidence before the Chair last year as to the state of affairs was rather indefinite. In the hearings this year we have a full statement of the matter under which it appears that in the development of the Minidoka project it is necessary, in order to develop a proper reservoir, to take over an area of land which happened to include the site of a town, and taking over that they are to purchase other land and move the town onto the new site. That operation is under way; a large part of the land has been acquired. Proceedings are under way to acquire the balance. It is a continuing operation, so that I think a point of order this year would not lie. If the gentleman wants the exact situation I shall be very glad to read it to him.

Mr. RAKER. Certainly I would.

Mr. CRAMTON. I read from the hearings:

The project contemplates an ultimate reservoir capacity of 3,000,000 acre-feet. The present plan contemplates 1,500,000 acre-feet capacity for the purpose of furnishing water to about 800,000 acres of land now irrigated, for which there is an insufficient water supply, and also to about 175,000 acres of new land.

The proposed dam will impound the waters of Snake River. A dam at this point will necessitate the moving of most of the present town of American Falls, the relocation of about 2 miles of the Oregon Short Line Railroad, and the payment of damages to the Idaho Power Co., which is operating a hydroelectric plant below the site. In addition to these items of cost there will be the purchase price of lands in the reservoir. This will include a considerable area of Indian land.

The land necessary to the new town has been acquired and most of the land in the old town has been acquired, and there follows then a statement of expenditures which is not pertinent to the gentleman's present inquiry.

It is estimated that the acquisition of the numerous lots in the old town and the various tracts to be inundated involves 1,500 abstracts of title.

However, except a small part of the original town site of American Falls, all of the reservoir property in American Falls has been abstracted, and perhaps at least 80 per cent of the typing of the rural abstracts has been done, and at little more expense can be ready for consideration by the Washington office.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, just one question, which I think will settle the matter so far as I am concerned. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] is familiar with this, and we have discussed it in various ways. I understand that this money, whatever it might be over and above the exchange value, will be charged up to the Reclamation Service and apportioned between the water users, and they will eventually in their repayments of 20 years pay it all back to the Government?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Newlands project, Nevada: For operation and maintenance, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $735,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 83, line 4, after the word "Nevada," insert the following: "and California, including the Honey Lake Unit."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I use the language that is found on page 81, lines 9 and 11, the Grand Valley project, Colorado. I have been seeking for some time to get the language and get the matter in proper shape.

I find the committee has made——

Mr. CRAMTON. May I ask the gentleman what he seeks? Does he seek to add a new addition to this—a new project?

Mr. RAKER. If the Reclamation Service should want to take it up, that is all.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will five minutes suffice for the gentleman to discuss the item?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; it is so plain that I can state it in that time.

Mr. CRAMTON. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I would put it "Nevada-Colorado." All of this water that is used for the Newlands project—it used to be called the Truckee-Carson project—originates in California. They are taking all the water from California and using it on the Newlands project, in Nevada. It is a Nevada-California project, and the name, so far as States are concerned, ought to be changed and ought to be that. They changed the name and gave it to Senator Newlands, who was very active in the reclamation legislation, and it is a well-deserved credit. It ought to be Nevada-California because the project is in both States.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would it not impress the gentleman as being more fit, if his amendment prevails, to call it the Newlands-Raker project?

Mr. RAKER. That would be a good idea, but I am a little too bashful to permit that anything be given my name; but for some 40 years—while I have not been as successful in these matters as the Senator from Nevada was, some day I may get some of these matters that I have been working on. Before the Newlands project started it was one of the first places I had the opportunity to go on, and it has used that name since. You will notice in the wonderful picture taken when they opened the project—you will find in an obscure place down on the side with the distinguished leader of that side my little miniature picture by the side of Senator Newlands and many others, showing I had been giving the matter some attention. The Honey Lake proposition is for the purpose of giving the Reclamation Service an opportunity to take this over, if they want to do so. The name itself means what it is, Honey Lake. Honey was found there by the early settlers. The climatic conditions are such that this water can very well be applied to this territory if the Reclamation Service wants to apply it, and it can be taken over and developed as the other projects. It adds no money, adds no great expense to the Reclamation Service or the Government at this time. If it does, it will come back tenfold, and I hope at this time the chairman and the subcommittee will see their way clear to do this. The State Legislature of California is behind this, and all of the local organizations. I should have had my resolutions here at this time, but did not realize we would get to this particular amendment this afternoon. It would add much to the development, and I trust the chairman will see his way clear not to object to the amendment and that the Committee of the Whole will adopt it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, nothing was presented by the Reclamation Service suggesting that they wanted this proposition. They have not done so, no information or estimate has come to the House, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Riverton project, Wyoming: For operation and maintenance, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $600,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD. A gentleman named Clarke is interested in a power plant which he claims is available for use in connection with this Riverton project. He asked for a hearing before this subcommittee. He was advised at the time it was not possible to give it to him, but he could file a written statement. He failed to do so. There came to the subcommittee and, I think, to a number of other Members of Congress, a statement of the situation from a gentleman holding the views of Mr. Clarke, Henry E. Pogson. I have also a statement from the Reclamation Service of their views in reply to his letter. It is a matter that may be more or less controversial hereafter, and I think at this time the statements should be incorporated in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by placing these statements in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statements are as follows:

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. BUILDING,
New York, December 21, 1922.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Have been informed that the United States Reclamation Service, under the Interior Department, contemplates the building of a hydroelectric power plant on the Riverton, Wyo., reclamation project, near Butte, Fremont County, Wyo., at a cost of about $280,000, from which they would obtain electrical energy in operating the excavating machines in reclaiming the lands upon that project. I am the trustee under a trust deed that was made by the Big Horn Power Co. that constructed a dam and hydroelectric plant near Boysen, Wyo., upon the Big Horn River, which is near the east end of the Riverton project. The trust deed above referred to was given to secure a bond issue of $350,000, of date January 1, 1908, and that hydroelectric plant has been supplying current for about nine years or more, and that hydroelectric plant is capable of supplying the United States Reclamation Service with all of the electrical energy that they will require in reclaiming those lands, at a net cost to the Government of less than half of the actual net cost to the Government in the event that it should construct the proposed plant at Pilot Butte, Wyo., at a cost of from $280,000 to $300,000, as the engineers of the Reclamation Service have estimated that it would cost the Government about $15,000 a year to operate and maintain that proposed plant.

Am informed that the Reclamation Service estimate that it will require about 5,600,000 kilowatt hours of electrical energy to operate the excavating machines in reclaiming those lands, and that they have only offered 1¼ cents per kilowatt hour for the current, which would figure out about $70,000 they offer for such current as they will require.

Officials of the Reclamation Service estimate that those lands can be reclaimed within from four to six years. Therefore the cost of operating and maintaining the proposed hydroelectric plant would cost the Government all that they have offered for all the current that they will require in operating the excavating machines. Their estimate of cost of operating and maintaining their proposed plant does not include interest at 4½ per cent upon the cost of the proposed plant, which would amount to about $12,500 per annum, in addition to the $15,000; $27,500 per annum.

As the trustee for the bondholders and as a taxpayer I protest most strenuously against the Government building hydroelectric power plants that will enter into competition with plants already constructed, and the Reclamation Service should not be allowed to use moneys that are in a revolving fund in the construction of hydroelectric plants where they can obtain power at a reasonable cost. Can furnish you additional data on this matter if you so desire.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. POGSON,
Attorney and Counselor at Law.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., December 27, 1922.

Hon. L. C. CRAMTON,
Chairman Interior Department Appropriations Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: There is returned herewith the letter of December 21 from Henry B. Pogson to Chairman Madden regarding power for the Riverton project. The Riverton project is the last to be adopted of those in hand under the Federal reclamation law. The works have not been completed to an extent that permits the delivery of any water and there is a large amount of construction yet to be done. For this, power is essential.

In view of the limitations on the reclamation fund, in general the Reclamation Service would prefer to secure the necessary power without tying up the reclamation fund investment necessary for the construction of a power plant. With that inclination, an investigation was made long ago by the service of the power plant on the Big Horn River referred to by Mr. Pogson. The plant was not found to be in satisfactory condition for the project needs either physically or legally. Mr. John T. Clarke has offered himself as the representative for the sale of power from that plant, but the fact is he has never had possession of it. On July 5, 1922, I wrote to Mr. Clarke stating the preference of the Reclamation Service to contract for power rather than build anew, but felt constrained to specify numerous things that would be needed to clear the way for a suitable contract. Copy of that letter is sent herewith.

None of the conditions laid down at that time has since been met. Mr. Clarke is involved in legal proceedings in his endeavor to secure possession and control. That these proceedings may involve considerable delay is suggested by the failure of past efforts and the number of times that the case has been considered and reported. In this regard I have these legal citations:

175 Federal Reporter, 702.
236 Federal Reporter, 516.
264 Federal Reporter, 492.
273 Federal Reporter, 923.

In spite of Mr. Clarke's failure to get himself in a position to do business, he has been very insistent that a contract be made with him. His attitude is illustrated by a letter of July 22, copy of which is sent herewith, and I am also sending copy of my reply dated Denver, Colo., July 28, 1922.

Mr. Clarke has also been an applicant for a power permit at the site in question under the Federal water power act. The Federal Power Commission recently rejected his application, and with the plant in its present condition, physically and legally, it seems out of the question for the Reclamation Service to contract for power from that source.

However, Mr. Clarke has represented his ability to make satisfactory showing regarding the requirements, and the Secretary of the Interior has twice extended his time for such a showing. The last extension carries to January 5, 1923.

In view of the uncertainty regarding ability to purchase suitable power, in the appropriation estimate for the Riverton project, fiscal year 1924, an item of $150,000 was included to provide the first installation of a power plant at Pilot Butte as a part of the Riverton reclamation project works.

This item is, of course, like many others in the reclamation estimates, dependent on contingencies. In this case if the difficulties surrounding the plant in which Mr. Clarke and Mr. Pogson are interested are favorably resolved, it will be possible to contract for power and utilize any appropriation made accordingly.

There are a number of figures and statements in Mr. Pogson's letter with which I do not agree, but I presume it is unnecessary to discuss each one in detail.

Very truly yours,

A. P. DAVIS, Director.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secondary projects: For cooperative and miscellaneous investigations, $100,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The secondary project is an illusive word, but it is workable and working. The department is using this money for the purpose of making reports, investigations on projects that have not been adopted. The data is furnished the Reclamation Service by private individuals, organizations, municipalities, or States. There is legislation now pending for appropriation for separate projects ranging all the way from $50,000 to $200,000. Of course, this comes out of the reclamation fund. There is no reimbursement to the Government. It is presumed that this will all be returned. The director appeared before the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands some few days ago and stated that there ought to be at least $500,000 for this work, for cooperative work, and that if most of it was put in proper shape that they would meet the Government appropriations at least 50–50. There is another appropriation just following, $100,000 for the Colorado River in this section, and I simply want to call the attention of the committee and the House to the fact that none of the projects are completed.

The nearest one is the Orland project, California, and they are adding a new unit to that for the users, and the project in Arizona, where they turned it over to the water users. So that all the investigation made up to the present time goes for nothing unless some of these projects are adopted. We have not the money to carry out the projects that have already been started. Those two that are under consideration, the Colorado and the Columbia, are so immense that if we are not careful we shall spend all our money on them, and the smaller projects, which can be brought into operation within two or three years, or five years at the longest, where families by the dozen and the score can be placed upon the land, will be deprived of their right during the next five generations to use or develop any of that land. The money for this purpose should be scattered over where it will produce diversified agriculture. That is what we need. We should not put all our eggs in one basket. I trust that the House will not go off with the idea that we must have only one grand project in contemplation.

This matter was taken up 14 years ago at the irrigation Congress at Portland, Oreg., where I presented a resolution that was agreed to by a unanimous vote, that we should take up and consider the smaller feasible projects that could be brought into operation. But during those 14 years the projects have not been completed, and you can travel over the western country and see dozens and scores of places where you can get from 5,000 to 20,000 acres of land under cultivation in a short time and place families upon that land and make it usable.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Has the gentleman offered an amendment?

Mr. RAKER. I have not.

Mr. SINNOTT. I wish the gentleman would.

Mr. RAKER. The trouble of it is we do not get before the Budget Committee and can not get before the subcommittee, and unless you get their approval on these matters you are down and out. In other words—and I say it without criticism; I would not criticize just for the sake of criticism; we are all responsible and to blame—whenever the Budget makes a recommendation, or the subcommittee makes a recommendation, or the full committee makes a recommendation, we immediately hold our hands and say, "By the gods, we are bound," and we can not say anything because the committee and the Budget Bureau have acted upon it. It is wrong, and it is bringing this body where it ought not to be.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman voted to overrule them yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

SALARIES.

Director, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,500; librarian, $2,000; photographer, $2,000; assistant photographer, $900; clerks—three of class 1, one $1,000, two at $900 each; two messenger boys, at $480 each; geologists—two at $4,000 each, one $3,000, one $2,700; two paleontologists, at $2,000 each; chemist, $3,000; geographers—one $2,700, one $2,500; two topographers, at $2,000 each; in all, $50,660.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in the itemized salary roll—I think it has been read—in line 8, after the figures "$488," there should be inserted "scientific assistants" with a colon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment proposed will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For topographic surveys in various portions of the United States, including lands in national forests, $324,500.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TEMPLE: Page 87, line 8, after the word "forests," strike out "$324,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire to make a speech on that? I am going to make a point of order on the paragraph if they are going to try to increase that item, but I will wait if the gentleman desires to speak. I will withhold my point of order.

Mr. DENISON. There is no use in the gentleman offering an amendment if it is to go out on a point of order.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have no desire to occupy the time of the House.

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman wants to make an explanation of his amendment, he can go on.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think his amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TEMPLE. The point of order was made at the time when I had been recognized for a certain purpose. If the paragraph goes out on a point of order, I do not care to be heard. If it does not, I do not want to lose my right to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had already reserved his point of order. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the regular order has been demanded.

Mr. BEGG. The point of order I make, Mr. Chairman, is that there is no law authorizing an appropriation for a topographic survey.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is mistaken about that, Mr. Chairman. The organic act itself permits just such a thing. That is one of the purposes of the Geological Survey.

Mr. BEGG. Well, if the gentleman can cite an authority for that appropriation my point will not stick.

Mr. BLANTON. I cite the organic act creating this particular department and this particular Geological Survey in it. It permits just such topographic surveys. They have been carried on for years and years. And I want to say that it is one of the most valuable institutions under the Government to-day. It has been worth more to the people of the United States in the discovery of new oil fields and the development of new oil fields all over the country than any other expenditure of money by the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, so far as the Committee is advised, there is no legislative authorization for the appropriation in question, although the appropriation itself has been carried for many years.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to call the attention of the Chair to Barnes' Federal Code. The Chair may have it. If he has and has just read it, I will not take the time. The general law creates the office of the director, but there is not a single word or line or sentence in the general law authorizing this topographic survey.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to suggest to the Chair in passing upon this point of order that for many years Congress has recognized the policy of making a general and complete topographic map of the entire United States. Year after year appropriations have been made by Congress and expended for that purpose, until in some States the mapping is 100 per cent complete, in others 86 per cent complete, in others 80 per cent, in others 56 per cent, and so on. I believe it comes under what is called a work in progress, an institution already established and more than half completed, and that even although there is no organic law for it the point of order would not be well taken. The work has been continued from year to year and is now partly completed, and the Committee on Appropriations is authorized under the rules of the House to bring in this item.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, this work has been carried on since 1896 under laws authorizing the United States Government to cooperate with the States. Twenty-three States are making appropriations and have been making appropriations for a great many years. In some States the work has been entirely completed. The statement I am about to make may throw no light whatever upon the action of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], but I wish to call attention to the fact that the work of the topographic survey in Ohio is 100 per cent finished. Ohio is not interested in this any more, but the gentleman's State participated in the work and in the appropriations made from the United States Treasury until Ohio had no further interest in it. Now the gentleman from Ohio comes in and makes the point of order against it.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman knows there is nothing in that statement.

Mr. TEMPLE. I said I did not know whether it had any bearing on the gentleman's action or not.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman knows better than that.

Mr. TEMPLE. I know that the fact is as I have stated. The work in Ohio is 100 per cent complete.

Mr. BEGG. Certainly. That is correct.

Mr. TEMPLE. And Ohio participated in the appropriation as long as she needed it.

Mr. BEGG. And paid for all the benefits she got out of it.

Mr. TEMPLE. She contributed a certain proportion, half and half, but the work has been carried on since 1896 under the law authorizing the establishment of the Geological Survey and the topographic work.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Whatever truth there may be as to the situation in Ohio, I can personally state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] has no knowledge of that situation, and is not in any way influenced by it. I will further state something else that will illustrate to the gentleman that we should not be too quick here about questioning the motives of others. There is one State in the Union that has profited from these expenditures heretofore to a greater degree than any other

State in that the survey work has been carried to a finer degree at Federal expense than in any other State, so I am advised, and that happens to be the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. The work in Pennsylvania is 62 per cent complete.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the work which has been done has been done to a finer scale than in any other State in the Union, and money has been spent for work done at Federal expense which should have been done at local expense.

Mr. TEMPLE. It has been paid for half and half in Pennsylvania the same as in any other State.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not wonder that Pennsylvania wants it continued.

Mr. TEMPLE. Half State and half Federal in Pennsylvania the same as everywhere else.

Mr. CRAMTON. But on a finer scale than in any other State.

Mr. DENISON. What does the gentleman mean by that? Will he please explain his statement?

Mr. CRAMTON. In the laying out of this work there is a degree to which it can be carried, which is determined by the scale on which it is done. I am not an engineer and can not make a technical explanation of it, but there is a difference whether only a general outline is given or whether they carry it to such a fine point that roads can be built from the survey. I am advised that in Pennsylvania this topographic survey was carried to a greater degree than elsewhere and that work was done under the 50-50 cooperative plan that should have been done entirely by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. As in other States it was done in Pennsylvania, 50 per cent at the expense of the State and 50 per cent at the expense of the National Government. In a mountainous country, where the contours quickly change within a short linear distance, of course, those changes of contour must be shown on the topographic maps.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes. There is one other point bearing directly on the point of order to which I should like to call attention.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will try to get the gentleman more time. I am informed that we have not yet got back to the pre-war level on this matter.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That we spent a much greater amount before the war began than is now being appropriated for this especial purpose.

Mr. TEMPLE. From 1910 to 1918 the appropriation for this purpose was $425,000 for the topographic survey, including $75,000 contributed by the forest survey to the topographic survey. Now, the proposal is to cut it down to $325,000.

There is a point of order to which I wish to call attention which bears directly on the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I want to finish this statement, and then I will yield. This is a continuing work. It has been going on for many years; and a continuing, unfinished work is not subject to the point of order which the gentleman from Ohio has made. We have arrangements with 23 States, and they are making appropriations every year. If this item is thrown out of the appropriation bill now, the arrangements with the States will lapse. Appropriations have been made for next year by the different States as follows: California, $16,000; Arkansas, $15,000; Connecticut, $6,000; Hawaii, $25,000; Illinois, $35,000; Iowa, $1,750; Kentucky, $17,000; Louisiana, $25,000; Maine, $5,000; Mississippi, $6,000; Missouri, $16,000; New York, $15,000; North Dakota, $1,000; Oregon, $4,000; Pennsylvania, $25,0000; South Dakota, $3,000; Tennessee, $5,000; Texas, $8,500; Utah, $24,000; Vermont, $3,000; Virginia, $5,000; Washington, $8,000; West Virginia, $5,000; Wisconsin, $13,500. These are appropriations by the States, and the United States contributes its share dollar for dollar. This is a continuing work, involving arrangements with 23 States, and it has a different parliamentary status than if it were a new work for which we were making appropriations without any authority of law.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the State makes an appropriation and the Government meets it; and if Pennsylvania only put up 5 cents, the Government would put up a nickel.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the Chair's attention to section 3796 in Hinds' Precedents, where it says that the continuing of the topographic survey was held to be in continuation of a public work. There is a decision by the Chairman holding it not subject to a point of order but a continuing project.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the ruling before him.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, let me state that at the most that can only be true as to the surveys under way, whereas this paragraph is not limited to those under way, but may permit any number of new surveys to be created, and not one penny necessarily will be expended for the existing surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question presented has already been practically if not absolutely decided. The language in the case which has just been cited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] is almost identical with the language in the present clause in the appropriation bill. The language to which objection was made June 13, 1906, where this proposition before the House was "for topographic surveys in various portions of the United States, $300,000, to be immediately available." Gentlemen will recognize the fact that that language is fully as broad as the language contained in the present appropriation bill. The Chair in the case cited overruled the point of order, although the situation was disclosed just as it has been disclosed here, and the objection made was that the language authorizing the appropriation was not found in the existing law. The Chair, however, decided in that case that he would be unable to find justification for sustaining the point of order because it was shown that the work was a continuing work.

The Chair desires to call attention to the following language in section 603 of Barnes' Federal Code as a part of the chapter which has reference to the Geological Survey providing for various publications in the Geological Survey, and the publication of maps, and for other work of that character. As long as the Chair can find justification for it in previous decisions, and as long as he can find justification for it in the continuation of work already begun, and in this case especially when regard is had for the fact that this work is a continuing work, being carried on from year to year in cooperation with the States who are making contributions from State funds for carrying on the work, and in view of the fact that the Chair has no right to presume that money will be used illegally and without authority at law the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, this work has been carried on since 1891. The purpose of the amendment is to permit the Secretary of the Interior to meet the increased appropriations from the States. The appropriations already made by the various States amount to $281,750. An interest is shown by several States which have not hitherto made any considerable appropriation for it. Some of the Southern States are becoming wide-awake on this subject. The oil development is raising considerable interest in Texas and Louisiana, and other places, and there is every prospect that the appropriations by the States will be in excess of the appropriations last year. But even if that were not the case, as was brought out by a question a little while ago, the appropriation has been cut not this year but in 1919. From 1910 to 1919 the appropriation for this purpose was $425,000, including $75,000 for Forest Service.

As the item in this bill reads now it is $325,000, including the Forest Service. So it is actually a cut of $75,000—from $400,000 down to $325,000. In addition to that there had formerly been an apportionment of War Department funds amounting to $200,000 a year.

The uses of these maps are various. Every city is interested in knowing what area it can drain for a water supply and how high its dam must be to impound the water required. Maps showing the contours are used for highways and save a great deal of money in making the preliminary surveys. I had a letter from an engineer in charge of construction on a railroad that was built through Ohio before the topographical survey was finished. After they had laid out the route to be followed by the road two new quadrangle maps came into his hands giving him information which, in a distance of 27 miles, enabled him to make such changes in the route that the company saved over $80,000 in completing that particular stretch of the railway. The same thing applies to the building of highways. It is necessary to know how high a hill is or how deep a valley that must be crossed. The topographic survey of the whole country is needed. There is hardly any civilized country where it has not been completed. Instead of increasing the speed we have been cutting it down. The Secretary of the Interior asked for $750,000 last year. He did not get it. It was cut in the House below the Budget recommendation, but the Senate put it up to $400,000, and in conference it was put at $325,000. Again this year the Secretary of the Interior asked for $750,000, but the Budget Bureau followed the compromise that was reached in the conference committee last year and gave $325,000.

These base maps are used as a basis for all other maps, and the making of them now will save the money that must be spent on maps to be made by the Bureau of Soils, it will save the War Department the making of its maps, and will save in a dozen ways by providing, as I say, a base map upon which all other information may be put which is needed for various purposes. The actual saving which the topographic maps would make possible is such that the House ought to pass this amendment and hasten the completion of the work.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the discussion of the motive prompting the point of order by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] immediately aroused in my mind a suspicion of the motive of asking for an increase, because I know the topographic maps are furnished for distribution through the Congressmen, and I wondered if there were not enough of them to go around. What are the facts? I am not against an appropriation for this work, but on sane business principles I am against this body voting more money than is asked for by the department without any added information that they can use it, beyond the fact that the several States——

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, the department asked for $750,000.

Mr. BEGG. The chairman of the committee told me that they were allowing exactly what they asked for.

Mr. DENISON. Oh, the chairman is wrong.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am sure the gentleman does not want to misquote the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BEGG. I shall give the chairman a chance to correct that if he wants to.

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not think the chairman said that they were giving all that the department asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no information as to what they would ask for. I think if they asked for it in accordance with Doctor TEMPLE's amendment, to complete this work, they would ask for a couple of million of dollars. We have given a figure that was granted by the Budget Committee.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield at this time. The facts are that we have used the machinery for ascertaining the information, namely, the Budget Committee, whose duty it is to ascertain how much can be wisely expended by these various departments. The Budget Bureau has recommended to this House $324,500, which this appropriating committee has brought in. The mere statement that 23 States have already appropriated a certain amount of money and that the possibility is that the State legislature in some other States might ask for a little more ought not to compel this Congress to add to the amount granted by the committee. That would be poor business. This is a small item to quibble about, but there is one section of the country that is interested in adding several thousand dollars to this; and the only good in the Budget Bureau is to live up to their recommendations, particularly with a thing like a topographic survey. It does not make any difference to the prosperity of Pennsylvania, it does not make any difference to the waterworks of the cities of Pennsylvania, great as they are, whether this work is completed in the next 5 or 10 years or in the next 15 or 20 years. The civilization of the country and the development of the highways and the water supplies have gone beyond a little bit of a contribution that might come to this topographic survey.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I would like to finish my statement. Now, as to the value of these maps, my city has a topographic map of the whole city. It is a little, ordinary, industrial city, and I think I know something about what goes on there. We have as good pavements in and around that city as any in the United States, and we never got one dollar's worth of benefit out of the topographic survey in constructing our waterworks, our sewerage system, or our highways. It is not necessary to pile up a great big appropriation for this thing, which can be continued indefinitely if some State happens to want to do it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto conclude in 30 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to have eight minutes, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] two minutes, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] five minutes, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] five minutes, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] five minutes, the chairman of the committee [Mr. MADDEN] five minutes, and myself five minutes. Possibly that makes 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the question of making these topographic surveys—and, by the way, that is the important question, it is not so much the making of the maps—is a matter of importance to every State and locality in the country. Of course, the State of Ohio is not greatly interested now, because the topographic surveys and mapping for that entire State have been fully completed. But this item in the bill is of great importance to all the other States. This work will prevent the necessity for the future expenditure of a great amount of money. It will prevent the duplication of expenditures. Every State is now carrying on more and more public improvements, the building of roads, the selection of water-power sites, the construction of water systems, the construction of sewer systems, of reclamation projects, of drainage projects, and all of these public activities require topographic surveys and maps. The Government has committed itself to the policy of making a complete topographic survey for the entire country. It is going to be done by the Federal Government sooner or later, and if we can hasten the work it will avoid a great duplication of expenditures by the States and save the Federal Treasury a large amount of money. It seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] is entirely wrong in this instance, and he has failed to show that clear and sound judgment which he ordinarily exercises. By doing this work now we will save the duplication of expenditures by the municipalities and States in all kinds of public works that require topographic maps.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman know of any city in Ohio that used one of them?

Mr. DENISON. If Ohio did not use those maps it is the only State in the Union that did not. It is her own fault if she fails to use the maps, because they are available and they are valuable.

Mr. BEGG. But they are of no account in a State like Ohio. They are all right in a mountainous State.

Mr. DENISON. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken; everyone knows that these topographical surveys are accurate and are of incalculable value.

Mr. BUTLER. Did not the State of Ohio put up its share for them?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. What information has the gentleman that the amount of money granted in the bill is not sufficient to carry forward this work as it has been carried on?

Mr. DENISON. I am now going to give that information. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] said, "Why not take the Budget recommendation?" Last year the Budget Committee recommended $430,000 for this work and the House cut it down to $275,000; the Senate increased it to $400,000 and the conferees compromised on $325,000. Last year you did not follow the Budget recommendation. Now, this year the Secretary of the Interior has recommended a minimum—he said it was the minimum amount required for this work this year—of $500,000 from the Federal Government. At first he asked for $750,000, but he said the minimum amount absolutely required would be $500,000, and I think we ought to grant it. Now, what will be the result? If we follow the recommendations of this committee and do not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the result will be this, that we will have to stop at least 50 per cent of this important work during the next year.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, in road building and drainage, as a concomitant for road building, for ditching, on the part of a private owner or a single farmer, these topographic maps are of the utmost value and in great demand?

Mr. DENISON. They are of the greatest value, and you can not conceive how many requests the Government has from different communities all over this country for these topographic maps to be used in the construction of roads, water reservoirs, drainage ditches, irrigation projects, and so forth. Now, the State I have the honor to represent appropriates more than any other State for this purpose. Last year we contributed $35,000 for this work and we will appropriate that much this year. We are going to have as much as $440,000, I think, contributed by 28 or 30 different States to cooperate with the Federal Government in this work, and this will be furnished dollar for dollar with what the Federal Government furnishes.

Now, these States want this work done, and they are liberally coming up with their part of the funds; they have their field forces ready to go ahead and cooperate with the Federal forces in the field; and I think, gentlemen, this important work ought not to be cut down, ought not to be stopped. This is work that the whole country is interested in; it is work that is of real value to the States and local communities all over this country.

Mr. LAYTON. Do not your constituents want these maps? I can not get enough for mine.

Mr. BEGG. Is it on the same par with the free-seed proposition?

Mr. DENISON. There is no similarity between this work and the distribution of free seeds. Here the Federal Government is carrying on work that is of real value for all time to come. A great country like the United States ought to have a complete topographic map of the entire country. We ought to have it for military purposes, as well as for these other important internal improvements.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Can the gentleman inform me as to how the national funds are distributed among the several States? Where the appropriations of the several States exceed that of the Federal Government, then does the Federal Government prorate the national funds in proportion to the State appropriation?

Mr. DENISON. I confess I do not know how that is, but I think it is prorated. At any rate, many of the States will next year contribute liberally for this important work dollar for dollar, and certainly the Federal Government ought to go ahead and complete this work as rapidly as possible, and thereby save duplication of such expenditures by the different State governments. I hope this amendment will be approved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, while the State of Ohio is 100 per cent complete in its topographical surveys, the people of Ohio after all are just as much interested in this particular appropriation as those of any other State, because the gentleman from Ohio is interested in the price he pays for gasoline and oil. We are presumed to pay less for gasoline according to the discovery of new fields. When you once have one of these topographical maps as a basis the Geological Survey may thereafter easily indicate upon it the results of its subsequent mineral investigations and note thereon what is known as the Pennsylvania formation, which is indicative of the possibility of oil. It notes the anticline which indicates the possibility of oil and thus is brought to the attention of many geologists over the country facts leading to the discovery of new oil fields all over the country. You take our beloved friend here from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. He has to-day in my district in the city of Eastland two of his sons who have expended very large sums of money in development plants in fields there, and their attention was doubtless directed to this vicinity by this work of the Geological Survey. Every one of us here are interested in it. There is no State, however complete in surveys, but what is interested to a certain extent on this one proposition of new oil and gasoline development alone, which is only one of the many good results obtained from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, let us get one matter straight before we go any further. I feel convinced that the majority in this House and the majority of this Congress do not want to take any backward step in the development of the Nation and of our natural resources, and I feel that every Member present, or practically every Member present, wants to give to the Interior Department for topographic mapping what is necessary and what they can efficiently use this next fiscal year.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] stated that the chairman of the subcommittee told him that they had given the department all it requested. The chairman was appealed to, and he did not answer that question; just why I do not know. As a matter of fact, gentlemen, and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and as a man who has taken up the matter, I tell you the Secretary of the Interior requested an appropriation of $500,000 for the next fiscal year, and that is the amount in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. He estimates and the department estimates that the cooperating States will demand or request $440,000 to carry on the work that they have in mind or the work that they have under way, so that there is no question but that the $500,000 will be essential, unless you are going to take a backward step in that work. Will you take it?

Why, I feel confident that my own State, which is put down in the hearings as probably appropriating $31,000 for cooperation, will appropriate not less than $50,000, and perhaps $100,000, by reason of the great problem it has on hand.

What is that great problem? We have three great rivers traversing the State, from 500 to 800 miles long. They have most fertile valley lands where, every few years, the floods come down and destroy millions and millions of dollars' worth of property and destroy human life.

We want to reclaim those lands for agricultural purposes, which will redound to the benefit of the Nation and ourselves. All we ask of this Government now is that it shall furnish, or assist in furnishing, scientific knowledge which can only be furnished by the geological department; and as a basis for the solution of our great problem we must have a topographic survey of these river valleys.

We expect to erect great reservoirs in the northern reaches of those rivers that will stop the onward rush of the water and impound the water so as to irrigate some of the arid lands not very far distant, and thereby prevent the flood waters from descending on the lower reaches and overflowing them and carrying houses and stock and human beings out to sea.

That is our problem, and we ask at the hands of this Congress an increase of the appropriation, so that we can make a commencement of that work.

Aside from that, generally speaking, we should have a topographic map of the agricultural section, of every foot of agricultural territory. The rolling agricultural section should be terraced in order to prevent washing and preserve the fertility of the soil by preventing it from being washed away; and the man who sits in Congress and does not realize the importance of preserving the fertility of our soil is a disgrace to the seat he occupies.

Furthermore, we need these maps in order to make these terraces to keep the land from washing, and we need these surveys in order to effect the reclamation of wet lands and overflowed lands. We need them also for geologic, mineral, and oil research, water-power development, irrigation, and road building. Yes, we need the topographic maps for every kind of work that is based on a knowledge of the surface and contour of the face of the earth, so that these maps constitute the foundation upon which many of our industrial enterprises are constructed, and we must have that knowledge. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will leave the appropriation item in the language in which it appears in the bill. The committee held hearings on this proposition, and we are very sure we have taken care of the pressing needs for topographic survey work that will be done independently by the Government, and then that larger amount that will be done through cooperation with the States. The estimates of State moneys available for cooperative work aggregate $281,850. The great drain upon money carried in this item comes about largely through the fact that there is no definite——

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman said "$181,000." He should have said "$281,000."

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. I should have said $281,850. One great reason why the expense in some of the States piles up under this item and no great headway made is on account of the fact that there is not an expenditure of the money furnished by the Government on a 50–50 basis for standard topographic survey work. Instead of standard topographic surveys being run upon the basis of a 50-foot contour level we have surveys on a basis of 25-foot or 20-foot or even 5-foot levels. Well, that piles up the expense. It makes a great deal of difference whether we are doing this topographic surveying on a basis of a 50-foot contour level or on a basis of a 20-foot or a 5-foot contour level, and if gentlemen will notice the work that is performed by the Geological Survey they will see that there is topographic work being done on all the levels that I have indicated. Manifestly it will be much more expensive to do the work on a 5-foot level or a 20-foot level than it will be where the standard level is 50 feet. It seems, then, that it would be the part of wisdom if the Congress required the department to adopt something of a standard——

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. In a moment—and then let the States and municipalities that desire to do more work than that contribute upon a basis larger than 50 per cent or else do the work themselves.

Now I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Manifestly for the department or for Congress to establish a limit within which to make these contours is impracticable for this reason: What is practicable for a level country—a 50-foot contour—will not amount to much in a mountainous country.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; but if the topographic lines in a level country must indicate low elevations, they should not be close together, or else the local community benefited should pay the extra cost. Take, for instance, a city that wants to pave. It would be a great advantage to the city from a financial standpoint if the Federal Government could furnish the contour levels at different elevations of 5 feet over what it would be if it furnished the levels at 20 feet, with expense for the intermediate levels to be borne by the city.

It seems that we ought to require a standard to be worked out so that the work would not be carried on in an intensified form in some parts of the country at great expense without great area being covered, while in other parts of the country the contours on a basis of 25 or 50 foot levels are entirely sufficient and probably what was contemplated when this contour work was begun by the Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. As a matter of fact there is a standard map now issued by the Geological Survey as a part of the general topographical map of the United States, based upon 50-foot contours.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. And that is where the bulk of this appropriation goes.

Mr. FRENCH. Originally; yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. I venture to say 95 per cent of it goes for that purpose, to make part of that standard map. Until that is completed we will not have a standard map of the country. The work on the 5-foot levels is only a small part of the work for which the appropriation is expended, and it is done for only two things—first to ascertain sewer levels in cities and, second, to place land under irrigation.

Mr. FRENCH. And the beneficiaries ought to share in larger degree the expense of the benefits received. That is where our trouble is coming in. Some of the States are insisting on low contour levels, and on this basis are wanting to pay but one-half the cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this item ought not to be increased, because it is quite as much as we should expend to carry on the work in a regular, orderly, and economical manner. It is perhaps quite as much as can be expended in a regular, orderly, economic manner in doing the class of work that the Federal Government ought to pay for.

Mr. DENISON. Why can we not spend as much as we did before the war?

Mr. MONDELL. I think this is about as much as we spent before the war. Those who are in favor of this class of work do not in the long run obtain the results they seek by efforts to suddenly expand and increase expenditures far beyond the Budget estimates and beyond what the department can use to the best advantage with its present organization. Further, the demand for work in the main comes from municipalities and communities that want the Federal Government to do in particular localities what it does not attempt to do and what it ought not to attempt to do throughout the country generally. Every one of those communities can secure out of the appropriation here provided Government aid in the work they desire to have done, provided they do what they ought to do, and that is furnish the money necessary to make up the difference in cost between the class of work they insist on and the ordinary contour interval adopted as the standard throughout the country.

When the ordinary 50-foot or 25-foot contour is followed the Federal Government pays most of the expense; but these localities that desire closer work and the benefit of the trained men of the service ought to put up the difference between the cost of carrying out the ordinary standard contour survey and the kind of a survey which they desire. There is quite enough money appropriated here to furnish Federal contributions beyond what the municipalities and the States ought to furnish for themselves.

I have watched this item for 28 years, and I have known one or two occasions when gentlemen made up combinations to suddenly increase the appropriation, and in every case where that has been done eventually their action reacted upon the service, and the appropriation in the following years was decreased beyond what it was increased under these sudden pressures. This is a highly important work. I hope it may be possible to somewhat increase the appropriation for it in the near future and steadily maintain it. The work will not, however, be benefited by an increase beyond the estimates.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] for three minutes.

Mr. CARTER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, our Government is engaged in one of the greatest road-building programs of any nation in the world. We are appropriating $75,000,000 this year for the building of roads. In my State we have a road system of some $60,000,000 in process of building. We need this appropriation. My understanding is that the scientific men connected with the United States Government have stated that $500,000 is the sum which should be expended and which will be required. I was amazed at the arguments of the gentleman from a city in Ohio. He seemed to base his opposition on the fact that his city did not get an immediate and direct benefit. That is the argument of building a Chinese wall around a city. A city becomes great and powerful by the arteries that lead to it, by the trade that goes in and the trade that goes out. I live in a great city, but this money will benefit my city because it opens the arteries in the States that feed that city and make it great. When we reduce expenses and economize let us not economize in any way where transportation will be restricted by that economy. A man has a small farm. He builds a wall, he constructs his drainage, he plants his apple trees on a slope and his peach trees on another slope and his grapes on an elevation. All of this information is of value to him, and the State can not furnish it all by itself. We match the States in road building. Why not match them in scientific knowledge and bring that knowledge back to the States? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the amount carried in this bill is the amount recommended by the Budget. It is the same as the appropriation for the current year. That amount has never been exceeded in our history before except in 1915, when it was $350,000, an increase of $25,000, and several years when it was $330,000. The amount carried in this item is approximately $325,000. That is to be spent only by matching the appropriations of the States. It does not need greatly to exceed the total of State cooperation. Now, I have here the appropriations of the States for a period of 10 years and find those appropriations even as low as $56,000, the total in 1918, and running from that generally around $160,000, $170,000, $180,000 up until 1921, when the amount was $273,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret that I have only four minutes. I want to be courteous, but I have not the time. In the current year 1922 the amount dropped back to $247,000. Now, in those years when the total appropriation was $325,000 and $330,000 every dollar of cooperation offered by the States was met except one item of $3,000.

Now, you understand there is a propaganda on that has been going on for a year. All of the geologists of all the States want the Federal Government to spend this money, and they are backing up the Geological Survey and they are padding their estimates to the limit of how much they will be able to cooperate next year.

Nobody dreams of $500,000 of State cooperation. Two hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars is the amount named in the hearings by the director as the amount certain, and that is not certain. I am told to-day by the director that at least one-third of that $281,000 is not yet appropriated but is based upon the statements of geologists who are spreading the propaganda. At the utmost $281,000 is the amount, and we are appropriating $325,000 to meet it. I do not blame the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Out of that $247,000 for State cooperation this year there goes to the State of Illinois $35,000 and to Pennsylvania $25,000; and so $60,000—one-fourth of it all—goes to those two States. I do wonder the gentleman from Texas takes the position he does. He ought to go to his own State legislature to make his speech, because in his State, where he says they are now clamoring that they will not survive if we do not appropriate $500,000, in 1912, 1913, and 1914 not one penny was offered for cooperation with the United States in this work. In 1918 and 1919 not one penny was offered. In 1920, $11,000 plus, and in 1921, $16,000 plus, and for 1923 the figures show $12,000, a reduction of 25 per cent; and next year, for which we are appropriating, we are only sure of $8,500 from Texas. We will guarantee to meet the $8,500 in Texas out of the $325,000 which we appropriate. Gentlemen, this propaganda is not only to meet what the States will appropriate—the item in the bill is sufficient for present needs—but they want to put on a lot of fancy frills; and it is just as the gentleman from Wyoming suggests—the States ought to pay for it and not ask us to carry the burden.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this committee is recommending an appropriation of the entire sum asked for by the President of the United States. Nobody asks for this, except a few men who are making propaganda all over the United States. They have given no consideration to the facts connected with this appropriation except their own problem—it will give them more employment. They are geologists, engineers, and they come here and ask that you override the President's request. If we were to go on as they would like us to go we might appropriate $5,000,000 for this purpose. It will take more than 125 years to make all the surveys that are being provided for in this bill. What is the hurry? Why should you undertake to increase the amount? You can not get the work done in less than 125 years.

Mr. TEMPLE. Unless you do increase the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not add much to the activity by putting $175,000 more on it, and we ought not to do that. Everybody in the United States, with possibly few exceptions, are clamoring for a reduction of the rates of taxation. Everybody that does not pay taxes is clamoring for the increase of appropriation. Which will you do? Will you make it possible to have the tax rate reduced, or will you force them to accept more money than the President says he can carry on the activity for? Whom are we to follow, the men who are making the selfish propaganda or the head of the Government who is charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the Nation? When the President says that he can do a certain thing for a certain amount of money I am glad if the amount is small. If it is more than I think it ought to be, I am one of the first to ask to reduce it; but under no circumstances will I say to the President, you ought to take more than you need. That is not my plan. It ought not to be our plan. It ought not to be the plan of the House. The plan of the House should be to speak for the American people, and the voice of the American people to-day, gentlemen, is in favor of rigid economy. Now, we will not disturb any rights by appropriating the amount recommended by this committee, and we will not advance any interest, except the selfish interests, by putting on $175,000 in addition to what is recommended.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman says it will take 125 years to do this work.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and by that time the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I will be dead.

Mr. FOCHT. I heard a good deal of this in the Pennsylvania Legislature, and I am sick and tired of the manner in which this has been conducted. If it is of any value, why not finish the job?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; why do not the States finish the job? Why should the Government of the United States be called upon to meet the demands of every State when it ought to be doing its own business?

Mr. FOCHT. It almost approximates demagogism when you talk about economy——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I do not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have great confidence in the statement of the head of the Geological Survey. Does he say that we need the additional money?

Mr. MADDEN. He does not, and nobody says they need the money except some outsiders.

Mr. DENISON. The Secretary of the department asked for more money.

Mr. MADDEN. He made no such statement to us. We gave every dollar asked for. I do not know what was behind that.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Did the head of the department make any suggestion to you?

Mr. MADDEN. He did not in connection with this. We are presumed to be here to appropriate on the recommendation of the only man in the United States authorized to make a recommendation—the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, all time is exhausted, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 41 ayes and 28 noes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CRAMTON and Mr. TEMPLE as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 87, at the end of line 8, insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in cooperation with States or municipalities except upon the basis of a State or municipality bearing all of the expense incident thereto in excess of such an amount as is necessary for the Geological Survey to perform its share of standard topographic surveys."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that debate has been closed upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that it was closed upon the paragraph, but not upon all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that it was closed upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYDEN) there were—ayes 42, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For geologic surveys in the various portions of the United States, $300,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Since the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has been adopted, I want to point out the effect of it. I have not had an opportunity to read it, but I understand that the amendment provides that no part of the appropriation for topographic surveys can be used in cooperation with any State or municipality unless the State or municipality expends an equal amount. But that does not prevent the whole appropriation from being expended without any cooperation whatever. If that is what the gentleman from Idaho intended, it is entirely agreeable to me, because there are many thousands of square miles of the public domain in the West which should be mapped entirely at the expense of the Federal Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. We appropriate $175,000 more than there is any expectation that the States will come across and meet us with, and we think it necessary, therefore, to protect the Government's money from State raids.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let us see whether this hasty and ill-considered amendment really does what the gentleman from Michigan thinks it will accomplish. The amendment provides for a fixed ratio of cooperation with a State or municipality, but places no limit on the expenditure of funds by the United States where there is no cooperation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, assuming the gentleman is correct, and I do not think he is, if the Geological Survey follows the practice he suggests with this amendment in the bill, it would probably not get very much for its topographic surveys next year, because the committee has made it very clear by this amendment that it is intended that when the Federal Government does work that costs more than ordinary standard work the additional cost shall be paid by the beneficiaries. I have every confidence the officers of the survey will proceed in good faith.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman is giving his interpretation of what the French amendment means.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what it says.

Mr. HAYDEN. But my interpretation is just as good as his; and I say that under its terms the Geological Survey can continue to do what it has always done from the very beginning. The survey can go into any State in the Union without cooperating with the State or any municipality and make a topographic map of a section of that State entirely at the expense of the United States. In doing so both the letter and the spirit of the law will be fully observed.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is entirely right. Ordinary standard surveys can and will be made wholly at the expense of the Treasury.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Wyoming well knows that the Geological Survey has made topographic surveys entirely at the expense of the United States in various parts of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, certainly. The standard survey and map is made at the expense of the United States, and it is proper that it should be.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then we are in entire accord.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is not proper that the Federal Government should pay the additional cost necessary when the contour interval is decreased.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman's interpretation of the action just taken by the committee is exactly in agreement with my own. It will still be lawful for the Geological Survey to make a standard topographic map in any part of the United States entirely at Federal expense without securing cooperation from anybody.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. If that can be done, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what they can do, and that is what I hope they will do with most of the appropriation, whether it is increased or not. I hope they will make a standard map, and if they do more let the communities pay the extra cost.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with either gentleman. I think the effect of the amendment is to nullify the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] increasing the amount, which has just been adopted. I think the gentlemen will find that that is the effect of it. At least some of the opponents of the entire amendment seem to think it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operation of mine-rescue cars, including personal services, traveling expenses and subsistence, equipment and supplies, $211,000.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 89, line 11, after the word "subsistence," strike out "$393,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,800."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of affording the necessary funds for a mine-rescue station in the vicinity of Terre Haute and Clinton. That is a bituminous field in which there have been many explosions and many very serious accidents. The amount that is required is so small I have no doubt that on a proper presentation of this before the Committee on Appropriations it would have been included. I had intended to present it to the Committee on Appropriations, but I did not get to do so. The amount involved is just $7,800, and I have had the amount carefully itemized by the Bureau of Mines and it includes the following:

Salary of mine-rescue and first-aid miner	$1,500
Travel and subsistence of mine-rescue and first-aid miner	1,000
1 light truck (one-half to three-quarter ton), complete	1,250
10 sets mine-rescue apparatus, at $221 per set	2,210
1 oxygen pump	265
10 oxygen cylinders	250
1 resuscitator	100
1 life line and reel	25
6 flame safety lamps	42
10 electric flashlights	28
Repair parts and supplies	230
Truck repairs	200
Operation of truck for one year	700
Total	7,800

As you will see, the total is only $7,800; and I should like to have the sympathetic attention of the committee in reference to this appropriation. I think this is the first time in the six years I have served in this House that I have ever asked for an increase of appropriation, and ordinarily I think these matters must be left largely to the Committee on Appropriations, but this mine-rescue work is of such great importance that I do not want to let this opportunity pass to urge the addition of this small amount for a mine-rescue station in that field. We were allowed a mine-rescue car there and thought perhaps that would serve the purpose, but the Director of the Bureau of Mines told me it would be away a considerable part of the time, and, as a matter of fact, that car is there perhaps a day or two in a month. There is a large area there which is subject to these explosions and where there are many losses of life and we are left without the proper protection of a mine-rescue station, and I very much fear not only will there be one or two losses occasionally, but I very much fear these explosions might cause the loss and entombing of a number of miners——

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that condition true of several other places in the United States?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think there is a place that is in such a bad situation as this particular locality—where the place is subject to explosions as it is in this case.

Mr. WINGO. Is there not at least one other field where they have very serious explosions and where the situation is exactly in such a condition?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. WINGO. I think not only in the gentleman's case but I think there are several others that ought to be taken care of.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Bureau of Mines stated to me—well, I do not know that I should quote this, but before when a particular situation like this arose and there was an increase in the appropriation and it was shown by the debate that the increase was for a particular station, the bureau followed the legislative intent.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Three or four years ago there was an attempt made by another Member from Indiana to secure an increase in the appropriation for this particular kind of work, and it was stated at that time that the Indiana fields were more subject to explosion than any other coal fields in the United States. I happen to remember that, because it was shortly after I came in.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The station was allowed, and it has been of very great benefit; and in reference to that station the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and a number of other——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Was this matter presented to the committee?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It was not. I had hoped to present it, but I sincerely hope that this small appropriation will be added.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that was not presented to the committee. It is not even a matter that the Bureau of Mines presses at this time, and I hope it will be allowed to come to Congress some time in its orderly way through the Budget and when there can be a full investigation of it. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The item already carries an increase of $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The committee divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 20.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana demands tellers. Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations as to the causes of mine explosions, methods of mining, especially in relation to the safety of miners, the appliances best adapted to prevent accidents, the possible improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the use of explosives and electricity, the prevention of accidents, and other inquiries and technologic investigations pertinent to the mining industry, including an amount not to exceed $1,000 for the purchase and bestowal of trophies in connection with mine-rescue and first-aid contests, and including all equipment, supplies, and expenses of travel and subsistence, $393,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have looked up the hearings on this item. I find on pages 674 and 675 a statement regarding the operation of mine-rescue stations and their cars. Will the chairman advise us if that was all said in regard to this item?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think so. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. RAKER. I am wondering where this money was spent and why they did not give in their statement here the work that was done in California at Jackson relative to the terrible disaster that occurred there this last fall.

Mr. CRAMTON. This matter was gone into at quite a little length last year and two new cars were given to them, and they stated they needed two more in order to supersede two old wooden cars they have. But that request was deferred for a year, and they asked nothing more except to continue the operation of the cars which they have.

They are asking nothing more than to continue the operation of the cars that they have. Just where each of those cars is operated and why they do not operate more in the gentleman's district the committee did not inquire. They did not go into that question.

Mr. RAKER. That is unfortunate.

Mr. CRAMTON. I admit it.

Mr. RAKER. Because it was one of the greatest disasters in mining history. That occurred this last fall. It has been the idea that these rescue cars and appliances should be applied to them, and it has been to a large extent. I feel that in justice to the Bureau of Mines and what they have done a statement of it should be put in the record so as to justify the necessity.

They should have more cars. These gold-mining men have done everything on earth they could to make the condition of the gold miner better and to provide all the necessary equipment up to date, so that they could mine with safety. The Committee on Mines and Mining of this House during the last eight years has been doing all it could, and legislation has come from that committee in regard to these mine-rescue stations and the advantage of those rescue cars.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. Is the gentleman aware that there are only nine of these mine-rescue cars in the United States?

Mr. RAKER. I know there are only a few of them.

Mr. RHODES. And that they operate out of these Bureau of Mines stations, and it is a practical impossibility, with the limited number of cars that the Bureau of Mines has, to cover the entire territory subject to accident?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want two minutes more, just to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. The gold mining, of course, has attracted and diverted the world's protection to the mining of coal also, because of the additional necessities of coal mining. Many people forget the circumstances surrounding the activities of the gold miner. Many men are interested in that branch of mining, and some of those mines are the deepest in the world—those gold mines—where the men are delving in the bowels of the earth. Not only should the owners and the States be required to provide for their protection, but the Federal Government, through its splendid equipment through the Bureau of Mines, should in the future add more to what we are trying to do to relieve the situation where necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations and the dissemination of information with a view to improving conditions in the mining, quarrying, and metallurgical industries under the act of March 3, 1915, and to provide for the inspection of mines and the protection of the lives of miners in the Territory of Alaska, including personal services, equipment, supplies, newspapers, and expenses of travel and subsistence, $35,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 17 insert the following language.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 92, at the end of line 17, insert the following: "Provided, That section 192 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply during the fiscal years 1923 and 1924 to the purchase from this appropriation of newspapers published in Alaska."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. What will this do?

Mr. CRAMTON. It will enable them to do what they have been doing heretofore, but under the new printing regulations and other requirements a question has been raised as to the practice.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, it is to legalize what is the practice now, and it is not objected to?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not objected to, and the bureau insists that it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and transportation of fuel; storing and handling of fuel in yards; maintenance and operation of yards and equipment, including motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for inspection, purchase of equipment, rentals, and all other expenses requisite for and incident thereto, including personal services in the District of Columbia, the unexpended balances of the appropriations heretofore made for these purposes is reappropriated and made available for such purposes for the fiscal year 1924, and for the payment of obligations for such purposes of prior years, and of such sum not exceeding $500 shall be available to settle claims for damages caused to private property by motor vehicles used in delivering fuel: Provided, That all moneys received from the sales of fuel shall be credited to this appropriation and be available for the purposes of this paragraph.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RHODES: Page 94, line 3, after the period, insert the following language:

"The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to acquire title to and procure on behalf of the United States, through purchase or condemnation, so much of the lands within the District of Columbia designated and known on the records of said District as square west 695, square northwest 695, and those parts of what were formerly Canal and H Streets as are now used and occupied by the United States as a fuel yard; that part of what was formerly H Street which intersects Half Street immediately adjacent to such fuel yard; and such other lands as may be needed as the site of a garage for the joint use of, and in connection with, such fuel yard and the Department of the Interior, and the construction of such garage is hereby authorized.

"All that part of Half Street which lies and extends north of I Street SE. in said District be, and the same is hereby, vacated, and the land therein, which is hereby declared to belong to the United States, is hereby set apart for and shall be devoted to the exclusive and sole use and occupancy of the Government of the United States as part of and in connection with the fuel yard mentioned.

"All appropriations herein and hereafter made for the maintenance and operation of the fuel yard mentioned may also be used and expended for the purchase or condemnation of land for fuel-yard and garage purposes as well as for the construction of a garage building thereon, as above provided for, and shall continue available for those purposes until expended: Provided, however, That no moneys expended for those purposes shall be considered as expenditures to be returned to such appropriations: And provided further, That the appropriation herein made for the maintenance and operation of the fuel yard mentioned for the fiscal year 1924 is hereby reduced in the amount of $254,088: And provided also, That the Department of the Interior shall from applicable appropriations reimburse said appropriations for its proportionate share of the expenses of maintaining and operating the garage mentioned.

"Hereafter the various branches of the Federal service and the municipal government in the District of Columbia shall make payment of accounts rendered against them by the Government fuel yard for fuel furnished them by depositing the proper amount directly to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States for the credit of the appropriation 'Maintenance and operation, United States Government fuel yard,' and duplicate certificates of deposits issued therefor shall be promptly forwarded by the depositors to the Government fuel yard."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment in question is one that was before the committee in charge of the bill, and it very favorably impressed the subcommittee, but it was not of a character to be within the jurisdiction of our committee. It comes now from the Committee on Mines and Mining, that properly has jurisdiction, and the Committee on Appropriations has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RHODES. And let me say, Mr. Chairman, in that connection, that the Committee on Mines and Mining has considered this proposed legislation and the Director of the Budget has approved it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of land at Bruceton, Pa., now occupied by and adjacent to the buildings and equipment of the explosives testing station and experimental mine of the Bureau of Mines, together with the unmined coal underneath these buildings, $33,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I desire simply to make an observation. I assume that the item mentioned in this particular paragraph is a certain tract of land that is well known and is identified, but the language is very general. It is "For the purchase of land." It seems to me that that might be extended to any degree so as to include any land.

Mr. CRAMTON. As a matter of fact, the land in mind and definitely in view, as I understand, is now covered by an option, and it is that which is occupied by or is immediately adjacent to buildings that we have there which are now worth something like $250,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Can you not identify it by some certain tract by name?

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not, except that it is land immediately under and adjacent to our plant at Bruceton.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why can you not state in the RECORD the lands you are going to buy?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield, I will give the names of the owners of this land.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to identify the land, so that this will not be a general authorization to buy all the land that they are wanting to buy.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not going to buy all that they need.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state it sufficiently to identify it?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The owners are J. Wilson, Eli McElhaney, and Pittsburgh Coal Co.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That statement is entirely satisfactory. I do not care about the acreage. That identifies it by the names, so that there will not be a general authorization to buy a lot of land.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a definite agreement as to what is involved, and the money will not buy the whole tract that is needed.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this item. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fighting forest fires in national parks: For fighting forest fires in national parks or other areas administered by the National Park Service, or fires that endanger such areas, and for replacing buildings or other physical improvements that have been destroyed by forest fires within such areas, $25,000: Provided, That these funds shall not be used for any precautionary fire protection or patrol work prior to actual occurrence of the fire: And provided further, That the allotment of these funds to the various national parks or areas administered by the National Park Service for fire fighting purposes shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior, and then only after the obligation for the expenditure has been incurred, and the Secretary of the Interior shall submit with his annual estimate of expenditures a report showing the location, size, and description of each forest fire, together with the number of men, their classification, and rate of pay and actual time employed, and a statement of expenditures showing the cost for labor, supplies, special service, and other expenses covered by the expenditures made from these funds.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what is the meaning of the proviso beginning in line 21, page 95—

Provided, That these funds shall not be used for any precautionary fire protection or patrol work prior to actual occurrence of the fire.

Does that mean that they can not use any airplanes or anything of that kind?

Mr. CRAMTON. Each of these park items carries an appropriation that includes fire protection. The rangers do certain precautionary watching, and so forth. This is purely an emergency item, so that in the event that a fire does occur in the vicinity of a park that endangers a great area of the park, or when a fire occurs upon the park that gets beyond bounds and makes necessary a large fire-fighting force, this emergency appropriation can be used to meet such a situation, but is not to be dissipated in the ordinary prevention of fire.

Mr. HICKS. Is there any service in the National Park Forestry Bureau in fighting fires from the air?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think not. It is my recollection that when we had the Army bill up one or two years ago that matter was discussed somewhat as to cooperation between the aviation branch of the Army and the United States Bureau of Forestry in connection with the national forests. There was then some cooperation. The work was done by the aviation branch of the Army at the expense of the Forest Service. There is nothing of that kind in connection with this appropriation.

Mr. HICKS. Last summer was unusually dry in the Northwest, and many forest fires of serious extent were raging in that section of the country. Does the gentleman know whether or not any of our national forests in these parks were injured by the fires of last season?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is my recollection that there was no unusual fire loss in any of the parks last year. Out of this $25,000 emergency appropriation only $9,000 was used in the fiscal year 1922, and we have not the figures for the first part of this fiscal year, from the 1st of July last on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $600 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $26,200; for construction of physical improvements, $8,800, including not exceeding $2,500 for the construction of a barn at Anna Spring; in all, $35,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman tell me what is included in the item of $8,800 for construction of physical improvements? The reason I ask that is because there has been a good deal of discussion about this Crater Lake proposition, and for a number of years the condition at Crater Lake has been very unsatisfactory. I think if the gentleman who represents the Crater Lake district was on the floor he would not disagree with that statement. Among other things that the bureau very urgently desired at Crater Lake was an improvement of the hotel facilities. Therefore I am making this inquiry to ascertain whether or not this $8,800 is intended to take care of those improvements. I would like to ask just how the matter now stands, whether the hotel has been taken over by the Government or is still in private hands.

Mr. CRAMTON. It does not take care of the hotel. The hotel is a private enterprise, which for a time was conducted by a gentleman who was not equipped financially to handle it successfully. A year ago a movement was under way by which public-spirited gentlemen, I think of Portland, were taking up the matter, and I think they have taken over the hotel and that it is now operated by a corporation consisting of men of large means, and that it is operated under an understanding with the park service, the same as the hotels in the Yosemite and the hotels in the Mount Ranier National Park are handled. These gentlemen have put in their money not as a money-making enterprise. They are limited to a small return on their investment, and they have done it for the purpose of developing the park by providing good hotel facilities.

The last I knew definitely about it there remained some little tangle, but I think that has been worked out. The appropriation in question of $8,800 is to provide a barn at Anna Spring, $2,500; a combination kitchen and mess hall at Lost Creek, $1,500; a trail at Kerr Notch, $1,600; a septic tank, flush toilets, and so forth, at Auto Rim Camp, $1,300; flush toilets at Anna Spring, $500; and a boat landing at Wizard Island, $1,400.

Mr. HICKS. I judge from this that there has been a new resort opened on the rim called Anna Spring. Is that correct?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not at the moment informed as to where that is. The rim, as the gentleman remembers, is about 30 miles in circumference and the hotel in question is up on the rim. The rim is about half a mile above the surface of the lake.

Of course, they are developing roads and trails, and I presume this is somewhat removed, a sort of halfway house on the rim of the lake.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Are the highways being constructed under this appropriation?

Mr. CRAMTON. That depends on the kind of highways they are building. There may be a highway which will be maintained under the maintenance item. If they want a cinder road, they will perhaps expend $150 or $200 a mile for improving it, but when it comes to a paved road they have to have a specific item for it.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lassen Volcanic National Park, Calif.: For protection and improvement, $3,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 98, line 21, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$20,300."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is significant in a way that since my membership on the Public Lands Committee we have created all the parks except a small number in this bill that appropriations are made for. I find that most of these I had the good fortune to report to the House and took part in the legislation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not now. The Lassen Volcanic National Park came along with the rest, and we have but $3,000 for its protection and improvement. I have made it my business to visit these parks.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman aware that they did not use all that they had last year—only $2,911?

Mr. RAKER. I will explain that. We want to use it to the best advantage.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I never had the pleasure of visiting this Lassen Volcanic National Park.

Mr. RAKER. Then the gentleman has missed one of the most delightful visits in the world.

Mr. HICKS. Are there any facilities there for the care of visitors? I have understood that there is no hotel there. Does the amendment provide for the erection of a hotel?

Mr. RAKER. I want to say that I spent 10 days there this last year. I make it my business to combine business with pleasure and to find out what the public wants. I was in the park and all through it. There are no two parks alike. While the Yosemite has been advertised for years I want to say that the Lassen Volcanic National Park is as great, but, of course, of a different character. It has been inaccessible heretofore, but now it is getting to be accessible. I spent 12 days there and never had a better entertainment or better provision made for me in my life.

Mr. HICKS. I am glad to know that; how was it done?

Mr. RAKER. By private individuals. They own a little piece up in the corner. The State of California has spent in the neighborhood of $75,000,000 on roads and highways, one of which goes up into this country. We are spending our money to develop the country. There is not another spot on earth that is comparable to the wonders afforded by nature in this Lassen National Park.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I have seen the gentleman's park. I have traveled through the parks of this country. I know a distinguished scientist who, after he had gone through the Lassen National Park, said it was the most restful, the most delightful, the most wonderful place that a man could go to spend some time in the summer.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Has the gentleman ever visited the Rainier National Park?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and it is just wonderful. Sure I have seen it. I have been to Tacoma, and I have stood on Mount Rainier, and have seen that wonderful country.

Mr. KNUTSON. How many voters did the gentleman see?

Mr. RAKER. Enough to keep one in Congress all his life if he will do the right thing at all times as near as he can. That surely is enough. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. This matter was presented by the park service, and was approved by the Secretary of the Interior for $20,300. The Bureau of the Budget allowed $11,000. The park service said that it could not handle $11,000 successfully and said, "Give us $20,300 or not increase it." Those were not the exact words but the substance. Now this park service wants this amount, the Secretary of the Interior wants it, but the Budget pulls the strings and says we can not have but $11,000, so we get only $3,000 as an upshot of the whole thing. Now give us something to develop this wonderful territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

[Mr. RAKER had leave to extend his remarks.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mesa Verde National Park, Colo.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $2,400 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of horse-drawn and motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $21,000; for construction of physical improvements, $10,000, including not exceeding $3,000 for completion of the water system at Spruce Tree Camp; in all, $31,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. In these appropriations for a park like the Mesa Verde National Park in Colorado, which is a park dedicated to the remains of the cliff dwellers, does any part of the appropriation take care of the excavation of those ruins, or is it entirely devoted to the care of the park so far as driveways, paths, and such items are concerned?

Mr. CRAMTON. Of the proposed estimate there is for the construction of physical improvements, $10,000. Their requests for physical improvements was $14,150, so that that has been scaled down. The $14,150 does not include anything for excavation purposes, such as the gentleman suggests. The item for administration, protection, and maintenance does include some expenditure for guides for the purpose of showing these ruins to tourists.

As the gentleman is aware, it is the habit of Americans, no matter how ancient or valuable a thing may be, to carry it off in parts, if possible, and it has been found necessary to have rangers attending visitors who are looking at these ruins.

Mr. HICKS. There is no charge made for these guides, as I recall?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; but that is cared for out of the maintenance item. I do not know of anything for further excavation.

Mr. HICKS. I thought it to be the case that excavation work is undertaken by the Smithsonian Institution, through the Bureau of Ethnology, and in this connection let me say that they are performing the task in a splendid manner. They have already restored many of the edifices of that ancient civilization, and from their researches, based on the relics which have been discovered, have contributed greatly to our knowledge of the peoples who lived in these canyon homes long before Columbus sailed on his first voyage. I desire to add my word of praise to the skill and scientific knowledge of Doctor Fewkes, who has given his life to this work, and to the marked ability of the present superintendent of the park, Mr. Neusbaum.

Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska: For protection and improvement, $8,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 99, line 6, after the word "improvement" strike out "$8,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, $10,000 was the Budget estimate. I do not know why the reduction was made by the Committee on Appropriations. I find that a number of parks have $10,000 as a minimum appropriation. For instance, the Platte National Park in Oklahoma has $10,000, and the Wind Cave Park in South Dakota has $10,000, the Hawaiian National Park has $10,000, while Mount McKinley has only $8,000. I do not want to start in with a comparison of the beauties of Mount McKinley with Mount Rainier or any other park, only to say that Mount McKinley is some park. I think it is only fair that we should have the amount which seems to be the minimum carried for the others.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that Mount McKinley is a very beautiful place. Seven people visited it last year that were reported. Some time when the railroad gets in operation and the roads are developed, and when it is made accessible, many people will go there, for it is a wonderful spot. For the present it seemed to the committee that the expenditure in connection with it should be practically nominal, and we continued the amount that has been heretofore carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I might add that we are anticipating quite an influx of tourists this coming summer, and I think we ought to have that amount for preparation.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alaska.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mount Rainier National Park, Wash.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $1,800 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $60,000; for construction of physical improvements, $35,000, including not exceeding $25,800 for new public camp grounds at Longmire Springs, not exceeding $2,000 for a residence for the chief clerk, and not exceeding $2,000 for an employees' duplex cottage; in all, $95,000.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 99, line 16, after the semicolon following the word "cottage," insert the following: "for continuing and completing widening the road between Nisqually Glacier and Paradise Valley, $38,000."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this amount is carried in the Budget, and still, including this item, the amount is just $25,000 less than the amount carried in the Budget. Mount Rainier National Park is one of the great parks of the West. This roadway that we desire to have widened is the only roadway that goes into the park. Last year 17,500 private automobiles entered the park. The roadway we now have is a one-way roadway. The great patronage of that park is during the months of July and August, and during that time an automobile passes on this roadway every minute, 10 hours in the day, either up or down the mountain.

As it is now they have a control system. They allow a bunch of automobiles, 100 or 150, to go down, and then there is a delay of a couple of hours, when another bunch comes up. They collect the forest rangers from the vicinity nearby to control the passage of the automobiles. Seventeen thousand automobiles is quite a number of private vehicles to visit a national park in 60 days. This is a narrow roadway, not a dangerous one, but no one should undertake to negotiate it unless he is a reasonably fair driver. It is nearly completed. The $38,000 provided for in the Budget will complete the roadway. There is a great deal of difficulty if an automobile breaks down and has to be taken up or down this distance of the control. In some instances for several miles there is not a turn-out. The road passes around elbows in the cliffs and unless it is opened it will be impossible for all of the automobiles that desire to visit it next season to go into the park. The automobile traffic has increased about 5,000 a year, and I refer now to private automobiles, for this estimate does not include the myriad of stages that run up and down Mount Rainier National Park. If the House could only know the exact situation I am sure it would sustain the Budget.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Where is this proposed improvement?

Mr. MILLER. From a place in the roadway called Nisqually Glacier through to Paradise Valley.

Mr. FESS. That is still above the protuberance of the glacier?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. Nisqually is the base of the glacier; it is the lower part of it. It is about 8½ miles from there to Paradise Inn.

Mr. FESS. The road up to the glacier is wide enough for two automobiles.

Mr. MILLER. Up to Nisqually Glacier; yes.

Mr. FESS. But this is above that.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; for a distance of about 8½ miles.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But the real beauties of the park are to be seen beyond Nisqually Glacier.

Mr. MILLER. That is true.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. I take it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to make Paradise Inn more accessible?

Mr. MILLER. That is the idea. And a number of our progressive citizens of Seattle and Tacoma vicinity have pooled together and built a very desirable and attractive hotel at Paradise Inn, of course without any reward or profit in it, and this simply makes the roadway, so that people can get up and down, so much more desirable. I would be very greatly pleased, and all of our western people, if the committee could see their way clear to allow this amendment to stand.

The director of national parks recommends this, and the Budget includes it. We are willing to forego other much-needed improvements if we can obtain this, as there is only one roadway leading into the park. We are willing to wait a while for the others. Now, gentlemen, the committee is $65,000 under the Budget estimate, and by allowing this amendment the committee is still $25,000 under the Budget. Over 70,000 people visited this great park during the season of 1922, and in all probability over 100,000 will visit it next year. It is one of the great parks of America, and as this increase will make automobile traffic both safe and speedy it will add to the safety and convenience of perhaps more people than visit any great mountain park in America.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to supplement what the gentleman from Washington——

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman from Washington has concluded——

Mr. MILLER. I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto may be closed in six minutes, three minutes to be given to the gentleman from New York and three minutes to myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This park happens to be in the district I represent. I hope that Members can see the necessity for the Government completing the 1 or 2 miles remaining, and I do not like to lose the right to offer another amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. We want to complete this bill to-night.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will withdraw his request and——

Mr. CRAMTON. I will make it eight minutes, three minutes to the gentleman from New York, three minutes to the gentleman from Washington, and two minutes to myself.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. May I have one minute?

Mr. CRAMTON. We want to get through with this bill, but I will make it nine minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think we all realize the need of public economy, and in dealing with these national parks many times we think money has been expended unwisely perhaps, but in this one instance I believe that the expenditure of the money provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington is a most wise expenditure of public funds. No one who has been through that park, a magnificent one—and, by the way, the only objection I have to it is that it is wrongly named; it should be Tacoma Park, named for an American, and not Rainier Park, named for a foreigner [applause]—no one who has had the good fortune to have been there and negotiated that trail between Nisqually Glacier and the hotel at Paradise Valley but must realize the danger of the roadway as at present constructed. There is a real danger there, for it is a single-width roadway for a two-movement traffic; and it seems to me in the interest of the public welfare we should provide the money to widen that roadway and make it safe for this increasing traffic, and therefore I sincerely hope that this committee will vote favorably for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to supplement the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from New York in what they have stated in behalf of Mount Rainier National Park, which is one of the early parks created by the General Government, created in the time of my lamented predecessor, Francis W. Cushman. Attention has been called to the automobiles that go up and down this portion of one-way road high on the mountain side. The number is increasing at a rapid rate. The county has paid for the construction of a finely paved road for 50 miles up the mountain, and the forest reserve has paid for 6 or more miles of well-built road through the reserve to the park line. From the appropriations that came from time to time from Congress the park road is nearly completed. The uncompleted part is the star part. It makes a curve that takes you to the cap piece of scenery. I have letters here written to me showing that without this appropriation the whole work to date is jeopardized. The need is great. Construction should go on. It has been a long and slow process. It is almost done.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. FESS. I am an economist, as you all know, but I think that the completion of this piece of work ought to be carried on. I had my impression very strongly increased by a conversation with the engineer about the possibility for the general public if this work could be entirely finished. But I was not certain at what point the needed improvement was. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. MILLER. This just finishes it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I wish to say that the gentlemen from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS and Mr. MILLER] and myself, representing the districts more particularly interested, have agreed to the withdrawal of estimates for certain improvements, amounting to several thousand dollars, which the Budget allowed, and have decided to concentrate our efforts upon what we know and what Mr. Mather knows and what the commissioners of the several counties know to be a real necessity.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there is very great need for other roads in order that the unsurpassed beauties of Rainier National Park may be used and enjoyed by the people of the United States. But this item having been already submitted by the Director of the Budget, we feel it should be restored. I have in my hand a telegram which I think covers the situation very briefly and very aptly. The sender says:

SEATTLE, WASH., December 28, 1922.

Hon JOHN W. SUMMERS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Referring to congressional appropriation in Budget covering item of $38,000 for completion of road between Nisqually Glacier and Paradise Valley, Rainier National Park. This matter is most important. It has to do with the safe and prompt accommodation of thousands of tourists annually visiting the park. This item should be restored to the Budget to protect the money already spent for this purpose, as well as for the safety of travelers. Hope you will use your best efforts for the sake of all concerned.

REGINALD H. PARSONS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I have visited about all the principal national parks, and I am an admirer of the administration of the parks. I think that Mr. Maher, the head of this service, is a wonderful executive, a wise and farseeing enthusiast, and has accomplished great things for the parks. He expends the money to great advantage. Personally it hurts me every time I have to vote to keep an item out of the park estimates. But, gentlemen, we must economize somewhere, and as to these parks, let us defer expenditures for their further development, spending the money that is necessary to take care of the people who are going there now, but limiting ourselves to that. There is not one of these parks that does not need something, so that if three Members from a single State would get up and urge the merits of any particular park and a few others would add to their request you would feel that it was very urgent. But we can not afford to yield to those importunities for amounts to be appropriated to make improvements that are needed. We must provide for sanitation and water supply and we must make the roads safe. This is not to make a road safe. There is no danger to life involved here. It is the last stretch going up the Paradise Valley. I have been over it, and I know the road will be safe if it continues as it is at present and we do not widen it. Widening this road does not make it more safe to the people who are in a hurry to get through a certain number of parks in a certain number of days. It would save them an hour, perhaps, if we give him this money to widen the road, but what can they do if they are compelled to take an hour longer, waiting here, that will be better for them than to view those natural beauties that are beyond compare? [Applause.] I know that if this money were provided it would be well spent; but I say that, having striven to keep the appropriations down in support of the President's policy, the committee deserves your support and I hope this amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (suggested by the Chair) there were—ayes 17, noes 18.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks for tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will please rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present. If there are not enough Members here to get tellers on a matter of this importance, I make the point that there is no quorum.

Mr. CRAMTON. The program of the House is that if this bill is completed to-night and the Post Office bill is completed to-morrow, I hope there will be no session on Tuesday next. If the gentleman wants to force a session here next Tuesday he can make his point of no quorum now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In order to limit discussion of this very important item, which has the approval of the Budget Bureau, I was foreclosed from offering an amendment which was $15,000 less than the Budget estimate.

Mr. CRAMTON. The chairman of the committee had the same experience the other day, when I could not get tellers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I submit that we are coming to a sad point when we are undertaking to put the high speed on appropriation bills under pressure and the promise that we can get a day off. However, if it is the desire to have a day off, as expressed by a number of Members, I will withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington withdraws the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer on page 99, between lines 17 and 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 99, between lines 17 and 18, insert:

"For construction, reconstruction, widening, and surfacing of highways, inclusive of necessary bridges, in the national parks and monuments, and for similar improvement of approach roads connecting directly with such park and monument roads, provided such improvements are within 5 miles of a park or monument boundary, $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926: Provided, however, That all appropriations for road projects herein authorized shall remain available until expended: And provided further, That the sum of $6,000 annually of the appropriations herein made shall be available for the employment of accounting and clerical help in the District of Columbia, available until expended.

"The Secretary of the Interior shall submit with his annual estimate of expenditures a report showing the various classes of road-construction work accomplished and the locations together with a statement of expenditures made from these funds. * * *"

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan reserves a point of order on the amendment. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have been giving this matter consideration, and it is a big, broad question. It covers what the people of all the Western States want—where these parks are—and it has been approved by the park service and by the Department of the Interior. First it was approved by the Budget Committee, and then the Budget Director was changed and the present Director of the Budget changed the former action, so I am advised. All the western people are in favor of it. They expect you people who are in power to carry out this program. Now, do not fail to do it.

I want to insert in the RECORD a letter from the acting park director, under date of December 29, 1922, together with Exhibit A and Exhibit B, explaining this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD his remarks by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letter and exhibits referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, December 29, 1922.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RAKER: I am glad to meet your request for a copy of the road construction budget within the national parks that the park service and the Department of the Interior has contemplated on a three-year basis of $2,500,000 per year, but which as a project could not be recognized by the Budget this year on account of the financial condition of the country. I am inclosing, as Exhibit A, a tabular review of the budget, which also contemplates some work to be done in a few national monuments. As Exhibit B, I am attaching comparative statement of appropriations made for Federal aid to State roads, amounting to $540,000,000 since 1917, amounting to $47,000,000 for national forest roads against $3,042.300 for all the national parks since 1872 to date. Over a million dollars of this $3,042,300 was spent in the Yellowstone alone by the Army, and that park has now the best roads.

The road situation in the national parks is one that requires and merits the serious consideration of Congress. It is a situation that can not be overlooked any longer. Travel in the national parks during the past four years has grown from about 450,000 to 1,150,000 this past season, and these travel figures are small compared to what they will be in the future. People visit the parks from all sections of the country, two-thirds of whom travel in automobiles and bring their own equipment.

The first national park, the Yellowstone, was established in 1872, exactly 50 years ago. Now there are 19 parks in all. Reference to Exhibit B will show that in these 50 years little more than $3,000,000 have been expended in road and bridge construction in the parks, while since 1916, when the first good roads bill was passed by Congress, $47,000,000 have been appropriated or authorized for road construction or improvement in the national forests, in addition to 10 per cent annually available of the revenue of the forests for such work and $540,000,000 of Federal money appropriated and authorized for cooperation with the States in road building, a total of $587,000,000, with not one cent available for expenditure in these great parks. In the same length of time for road projects in the parks $1,265,000 was appropriated, and the pending Interior Department bill before the House contains somewhat less than $200,000 for the construction of roads in Sequoia, Glacier, and Grand Canyon Parks. In Mount McKinley, Hawaii, Wind Cave, General Grant, Lafayette, Lassen, and other parks not a bit of road building has been done by the National Park Service.

All this road building by the National Government has pointed to a healthful expansion of a vigorous, growing nation, and every dollar so appropriated has been necessary and valuable. On the other hand, the national parks have been practically overlooked. These wonderful scenic exhibits, which outrank those elsewhere in the world, are the scenic lodestones of travel. They draw travel as nothing else does. People visit them, and in visiting them necessarily must get acquainted with the rest of the country through which they pass. Becoming thus acquainted, in addition to the money that they leave incidental to their travel, they become settlers and large investors in States in which the parks are located. The great majority of these visitors come by automobile. Under our large national road-development program, to which have been added the splendid work done by States and counties throughout the West, we find excellent roads up to the park boundaries, and there we stop. An interesting situation may be observed in connection with the road systems of the Yosemite National Park. Here we have 138 miles of roads, of which the Government has only constructed 8 miles. These roads were constructed for horse-drawn vehicular travel, as is the case in all parks, and have received serious punishment in the past four years by the constantly increasing hordes of motor cars, yet in the Yosemite, where visitors approach the park over excellent roads for which not one cent is charged, we encounter the situation where for the use of roads not built by us we are charging $5 entrance fee per car.

The service is receiving complaints in increasing numbers regarding road conditions in the parks, and we consider these generally well merited. There is no serious complaint against the exaction of the license fee as such, but the complaint we hear is that for this license fee, which is really in the nature of a toll, the visitors expect at least comfortably negotiable roads.

The overdevelopment of parks by roads must, of course, be guarded against. There must always be areas into which no roads shall enter. Our program is considered a modest one in extent, but will take care of what is considered a definite road program without overdevelopment in the parks.

Sincerely yours,

ARNO B. CAMMERER,
Acting Director.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, United States.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. If the chairman is going to protect a matter of that kind, involving several million dollars, I make the point of order on the ground that it is legislation unauthorized by law, that it is a change of law, and it is for new construction not authorized by law.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will withhold his point of order, I am satisfied that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not know the sentiment that I can see all around me.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have endeavored to ascertain it.

Mr. BLANTON. There are too many gentlemen from the Northwest interested in this two and a half million-dollar expenditure. I make the point of order and I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] makes the point of order. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Platt National Park, Okla.: For administration, protection, maintenance, and improvement, $10,000.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a few days ago I appeared before the subcommittee on appropriations for the Interior Department urging a larger appropriation for Platt National Park at Sulphur, Okla. I would offer an amendment now to increase this appropriation, but realize that it would be useless to do so and that it would go as other similar amendments have gone. The committee has recommended $10,000, $2,500 more than last year, and I am thankful for the increase, but the amount is insufficient. The citizens of Sulphur spent between $13,000 and $16,000 last year from their own pockets on this park, which I will tell you about at this time.

In making appropriations for our national parks the committee and Congress should look to the usefulness and the purpose it serves. Platt National Park was created by the act of Congress of July 1, 1902. It has an area of 848 acres and is situated in Murray County, Okla., adjacent to the city of Sulphur, which is noted for its energetic, intelligent, Christian, law-abiding citizenship. The park was set aside for the benefit and use of the people of the United States because of the medicinal value of its many springs. It has more than 30 mineral springs, and will become one of the world's most noted health resorts. The value of a national park is determined, in part, by the number of visitors. The figures of the park superintendent show the following visitors:

1920	173,310
1922	246,998

These figures show the wonderful increase of the visitors to the park in the past four years. In 1919 there were 689 campers; in 1920, 2,981; in 1921, 10,526; and in 1922 there were 23,170 campers in Platt National Park. The campers in 1922 used 6,084 automobiles, and it is estimated that at least 30,000 cars were in the park during the season of 1922.

The park superintendent, in his statement contained in the report of the national park service for 1922, says:

During the past year the city of Sulphur, realizing the deplorable condition of the park and desiring to be a benefit to the many people coming here, built and paid for two fine community buildings, one at the Bromide Camp Grounds and one at the Cold Springs Camp Grounds. They dug sewer lines to each, installed three new comfort stations and repaired another, brought water to both these camp grounds in sufficient quantities for all purposes, and then, on top of this, they had electric wires put up that the campers might have lights. The city of Sulphur spent between $13,000 and $16,000 to help Platt National Park.

The report of the Director of the National Park Service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, on page 66, states:

During the year the city of Sulphur, which adjoins Platt National Park, donated between $13,000 and $16,000 for park improvements. * * * This excellent cooperation on the part of the city of Sulphur was appreciated both by the visitors and this service. It is estimated that 246,998 visitors in all entered the park gates. As many of them undoubtedly repeated their visits from day to day, 70,000 individuals is considered a fair estimate of the travel. The park is a focal point for motor travel from all the Southern States west of the Mississippi. During the season the campers held several big meetings and community camp fires and organized a Platt Park Club with over 100 vice presidents in different States. The aim of the club is to tell others of the benefits to be derived from the health-giving waters of the park and to see that it has financial help to properly maintain it and for needed improvements. The wild animals maintained under fence in the park were added to; a fine bull elk from Yellowstone was received, four fawns were added to the deer herd, and a baby buffalo was born in the park. The park roads are especially in need of improvement and adequate appropriations should be made to bring them up to a standard worthy of a national park.

The report shows that while 246,998 visitors in all were estimated to have entered the park gates, 70,000 is considered a fair estimate, as some were counted more than once. While this is true that some visitors were counted more than once, many visitors were not counted at all, as they did not visit Bromide Springs, where visitors are checked.

The present system of roads in the park, which amounts to about 11 miles, should be widened and surfaced. Congress can not appropriate money to a better advantage than to improve and restore the health of its citizens. Platt National Park was segregated for the purpose of conserving its mineral waters and to make it available to the people of the country. In order to carry out this purpose it is necessary for adequate, not extravagant, appropriations to be made. On page 54 of the director's report is a picture showing a large number of people attracted to this great health resort. The report says:

The national parks and monuments play a very important part in the conservation of wild life, for in them all animals, with the exception of predatory ones, find safe refuge and complete protection and live unhampered in natural environment.

The report of the director for 1922 in the leading parks shows the following number of visitors, appropriations, and private automobiles entering the parks for each of the past three years:

From this report it is seen that Sequoia Park in 1922, with 27,514 visitors, a little more than one-third of the visitors in Platt National, received an appropriation of $78,000, while Platt received the inadequate sum of $7,500. Mesa Verde Park, with 4,251 visitors, received $43,000 for the present fiscal year, or with less than one-seventeenth of the vistors accredited by the director, it received nearly six times the amount of money given Platt National Park.

The good people of the city of Sulphur should not be required to spend their money on the improvement of the park. They have continued to do this uncomplainingly, but Congress should act now. This park, like the other national parks, belongs to the United States Government and is a part of its property. They were set aside by Congress and should be maintained properly by this body.

The last State Legislature of Oklahoma, recognizing the health-giving properties of the mineral waters in Platt National Park, appropriated $389,700 for the erection of a sanitarium for tubercular soldiers of the World War. This hospital has 80 beds and 66 patients at the present time, 52 of these being Government patients. Twenty-eight persons are employed at the hospital. The people of Oklahoma wanted a hospital where our soldiers could be properly cared for, with healthful surroundings, beautiful scenery, and Christian influences, and the legislature, in its wisdom and goodness, selected Platt National Park for the location. In addition to an excellent public school system, Sulphur has the Oklahoma School for the Deaf. This school comprises nine buildings, which are brick, except one; this year 30 teachers are employed in this school, 31 employees, and 310 students from 66 counties of the State. The State appropriated for this school for the biennium 1920–21 and 1921–22 for maintenance the sum of $72,000. I make mention of these facts to show that the State of Oklahoma is not unmindful of its duties to our soldier boys and the unfortunates in having them properly cared for and in pleasant, healthful surroundings.

The many springs in the park produce sulphur water of all kinds, shades, and degrees—medicine water, bromide water, and water as pure as gold—just any kind of water that a person may desire and need in recovering his health. You gentlemen who have never tasted this water and felt its rejuvenating effects can not even imagine its stimulating, health-restoring properties.

Mr. Chairman, if the Republican whip [Mr. KNUTSON] would go to Platt National Park, take a few of the sulphur baths, and drink a few glasses of that bromide water he would be a sure enough whip when he came back and would feel so good that he would always be a friend of the park. It has that effect on people who go there. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Then we ought not to seal it up and keep people away from it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANK. They do not stay away from it, as the figures will show. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have seen men carried into that park on stretchers, and in a few weeks, after bathing in the sulphur water and drinking the bromide water, they would go home cured.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. Yes.

Mr. LOWERY. If we grant you all that you ask, will you guarantee that the Republican whip will take the baths that the gentleman spoke of? [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANK. One bath and one drink of water from the springs would cause him to want to stay there the rest of his life.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am willing to admit that this park is really a remarkably fine municipal park of some State importance maintained at Federal expense.

Mr. SWANK. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, this is a national park, visited by people from all sections of the country. I am going to hope that the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will visit this park some time, and before next year's budget is made up I hope to have him on our side when I ask for an increased appropriation for the park.

Mr. KNUTSON. If what the gentleman says is true about the effect of that water, would it not be a good idea to put in a bottling works for the purpose of distributing the water to people who can not go there?

Mr. SWANK. They do ship it out of there in trainloads.

No park in the Nation has such wonderful water. One artesian well—and there are many—spouts forth 2,500 gallons of pure sulphur water per minute, while Buffalo Springs produce 5,000,000 gallons per day. Some of the water comes from wells 800 feet deep, and it is clear, pure, and healthful. Three of these great artesian wells empty into elegant bathing pools, where the young, old, infirm, decrepit, and those who have so far advanced in years or in living can bathe, become young again, and have their lost powers restored.

If a person is troubled with sleeplessness a few drinks of that bromide water will cause him to fall into that peaceful sleep known to those in good health and with untroubled minds. It will rebuild your nerves and make you a new man, and if the chairman of the subcommittee could just visit that park one time, take a few drinks of the water, feel the new vigor being brought back to him, I know that he would favor this park. If you are troubled with rheumatism, a few baths in the sulphur water, with its internal use, will cause the pains to leave and, like the cripple of old, you can "rise up and walk." If any gentleman on the floor doubts any of my statements, a visit there will convince you of the truthfulness of the same, and I extend to you an urgent invitation on behalf of the good people of Murray County and of Oklahoma to pay the park a visit, and if you are "run down" and overworked from any cause, you can there find the fabled "Fountain of youth," where the old may become young again and where the young and middle aged must use caution and discretion in restraining themselves; and had Ponce de Leon landed at this place in his wanderings and in looking for his youth he would have been convinced that he had found the goal of his long search.

This park is not local but is national in its scope and in the range of its usefulness. While all classes visit there, the rich and poor, the sick and well, it is essentially a park for the good of the great masses of the people who can not afford to visit the more costly parks, where living expenses are high, and bathe in the expensive bathhouses. Here they may bathe in the many pools and creeks without cost and partake of the water that has restored so many people to health. People visit this park from all sections of the country. Congress should make an appropriation to properly maintain the park and should also provide for the erection of a reasonable number of Government bathhouses, where the people who desire can take the baths at a nominal cost, and let it truly be the "park of the people."

The amount recommended by the subcommittee is greatly inadequate and out of proportion to the amount recommended for many other parks that do not have the visitors that this park has and do not do so much good. The amount appropriated last year was barely sufficient to maintain the park and will allow nothing for improvements. The springs should be improved, roads repaired, and new roads constructed. The "Ozark Trail" and the "Bankhead Highway" both pass through Sulphur and it is on the principal motor route through the State. This is destined to become one of the leading national parks and health resorts of the country, as it is now nationally known for its usefulness and healthful surroundings.

While the chief value of Platt National Park is in restoring people to health and renewing the vigor of youth, it is a place of great natural beauty. It is situated in the foothills of the famous Arbuckle Mountain Range, near the historic, beautiful, and fertile valley of the Washita, overlooking the beautiful little city of Sulphur, nestled in her lap, and here you are given a different view of nature and wonder at her work.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I sincerely hope and trust that the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee will see the usefulness of this great park, that many Members will visit there and enjoy the hospitality of the good people and see the value of the park, for next year I will ask for an adequate appropriation. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The National Park Service may exchange hereafter, as part consideration, in the purchase of new equipment, motor vehicles, and any other equipment for use in the national parks.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the people of the United States know how thoroughly they are to be congratulated on having Stephen T. Mather at the head of the National Park Service.

Mr. Mather represents the highest type of public servant. He is able, he is efficient, he is a regular human dynamo, and more than that, he is serving at a distinct financial sacrifice to himself, because he believes in his great work. A man of independent means and in the prime of life, he has taken the office of Director of National Parks and is contributing from his own resources for the upkeep and for the improvement of many of the national parks throughout the United States. A moment ago we passed the item pertaining to Glacier National Park, but do you know that out of his own means, Mr. Mather bought and then donated to the Government the lands at Belton Station, so that a fitting entrance could be had upon property belonging to the park itself?

Do you know that that fine rangers' clubhouse at Yosemite National Park, costing some $30,000, was donated to the park by Mr. Mather?

Do you realize that to Mr. Mather and to a former Member of this body, Mr. Kent, of California, the country is indebted for great financial gifts and then for a campaign that is saving to posterity the large area of land in California containing hundreds of specimens of one of the gigantic redwood species of the Pacific?

These are but illustrations that indicate the devotion to his work and the willingness for sacrifice of the head of our National Park Service.

And with the business of the national parks his work has been phenomenal. Under his direction the public has become intensely interested in the great wonders that are close at home. The number of people visiting the parks has increased from 451,661 in 1918 to 1,044,502 during the present year. In 1918, 53,966 automobiles entered the parks, this year 197,105. As for revenue, while we would not consider converting the parks into revenue sources, we will be glad to see them largely pay their way, and the returns this year were $432,964.89 as against $180,652.20 only five years ago.

In the face of all this, all Mr. Mather wants is cooperation. And yet here is such a record that if it were accomplished in any great private business would entitle its builder not only to cooperation but to be chosen to a directorate of that particular business for the rest of his life. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, will soon be abandoned as a military post. While we are under the heading of national parks I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the advisability of the Government protecting Fort McHenry, the birthplace of the Star-Spangled Banner, as a national park.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Howard University, $232,500.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. Is Howard University the only college or university maintained at Government expense in the city of Washington?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think Howard University, in the city of Washington, is the only college or university that has any contribution from the Government.

Mr. LOWREY. What is the ground for the maintenance of Howard University?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is the only national institution anywhere of college rank for the colored race. While they are admitted to some institutions, they are not admitted to others.

Mr. LOWREY. Is there such an institution for any race outside of Howard University?

Mr. CRAMTON. We are doing something for the Indians. I do not think we have any college or university, but we did have Carlisle. Howard University was an institution of which Gen. O. O. Howard was instrumental in laying the foundation of in other days.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I want to say that Carlisle never had a college course. They only took the children to the end of the high-school course.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I should correct my statement to this extent: The Government does contribute to the support of Gallaudet College for the Deaf and Dumb.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 104, line 8, strike out all after line 7 to the end of line 11 on page 105.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's amendment comes too late. We have passed that and the only item that we are now considering is "Totals for Howard University."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALASKA ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

For expenses of maintenance and operation of railroads in the Territory of Alaska (in excess of revenues), $1,000,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been asked for in accordance with the estimate of the Budget. The original estimate was $1,300,000, but the Budget Committee allowed $1,160,860. The Department of the Interior, knowing the absolute necessity in order that the railroad might be completed and ballasted, appealed to the President to arouse his interest in the matter.

The result was that the Budget Bureau recommended a supplementary estimate of $200,000. I do not mean to say that the President had a particular interest in this item any more than the request of the Department of the Interior appealed to him, and as a result the supplemental estimate was made.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is this to be an annual appropriation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is a part of the appropriation for the maintenance of the way. The track for 60 miles beyond the new bridge is to be broadened. It is now a narrow gauge and it can be broadened at a short notice, and when that is done and the railroad is ballasted it will be complete to the terminal point.

Mr. DOWELL. And this appropriation is for that purpose?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The maintenance and for the general operation of the road.

Mr. DOWELL. If I understood correctly, a year ago we appropriated $15,000,000 which was to entirely complete that road and pay all expenses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is really for the maintenance of the railroad.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not for construction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it is to maintain the way and ballast the track, which, of course, will be an annual expense, but very greatly reduced. This year the President plans to go to Alaska. He plans to ride over this railroad.

The railroad is open to traffic and I might say that it will be dedicated, and of course it should be in complete order when he visits it in July or August. This summer we anticipate a great many visitors to McKinley Park. The Brooklyn Eagle has made arrangements to take a party of 75 to McKinley Park. They plan to be there at the time of continual sunshine and dedicate the park at midnight. With the President going in there and the influx of visitors, I do not think that Congress should be niggardly in this matter of appropriation. The Secretary of the Interior asked the head of the railroad commission to submit the least estimate, and he made it. These are the lowest figures and $100,000 less than his estimate. The amount asked for is exactly the amount of the Budget after it had reconsidered its original estimate by sending in a supplemental estimate of $200,000. I want to say that Alaska has been peculiarly affected by the general policy of retrenchment on the part of the Government.

Of the four military posts that we had, three have been recently removed, and all of the troops taken out and the barracks abandoned. Our telegraph system has been reduced somewhat, and it seems that whenever the Army or any of the departments look for a place to retrench they fix on Alaska. We have no Senators to interfere and we have no regular Member of Congress to enter protest against these cuts in our appropriations. In this case the President has appealed for us, and I maintain that that ought to be allowed, the opposition of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the item in question is to take care of an anticipated operating deficit. The ideal would be to conduct a railroad without deficit, and that is what we want to look forward to. A year ago the same authorities came before us and I esteem Colonel Mears very highly. They asked for $1,660,010 as an operating deficit for the current year. The committee felt then just as they do now. The officer in charge of operations necessarily makes his figure at the maximum deficit reasonably to be expected, yet Congress should appropriate the minimum sum that is reasonably to be expected, and last year we appropriated only $1,400,000. We cut their estimates $262,000 over their protest, believing that if their figures were correct and they had to have the other amount they would come back to the deficiency committee and put their figures on the table and would get the money, but they would have to show the need at that time. What happened? They were just as sure last year and still they are just going to get through this year on the $1,400,000 that we gave them. If we had given them $1,600,000 it would have gone.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not the presumption that it would be operated within the appropriation? He can not incur a deficit.

Mr. CRAMTON. He operated on the money that we gave him. He would not have wasted the other, but he might have found some trimmings to put on that railroad. This year we did the same thing. There is more traffic being developed. We give authority in the bill to develop that Yukon River country and its tributaries, and if that will accomplish what they think it will, the committee thinks they will get through this year with a deficit not above $1,000,000, and we hope it may come under that figure.

Mr. KNUTSON. According to the statement of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND], they expect an increase in the tourist business there of 700 per cent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Provision is all made for that in the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. The committee felt that in the interest of economy we should keep this figure.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the original $35,000,000 with which to build this road under a good deal of trepidation. How much have we already expended?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the total authorization is $56,000,000. It has all been appropriated except the $800,000 plus, which is carried in this bill, and we are told that that will complete the construction of the road. The gentleman [Mr. SUTHERLAND] speaks of their suffering from the war situation. A large part of the cost was caused by war conditions.

Mr. DOWELL. I notice the gentleman from Alaska stated that this was for the purpose of widening the road?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; not that amount.

Mr. DOWELL. It could not be used for that, because the entire construction has been already appropriated.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; this bill carries $800,000, which includes in part the widening of the track, but that is not in this particular item.

Mr. DOWELL. This item is purely for operating deficit?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Anticipated deficit?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But included in that would be the ballasting of the track.

Mr. CRAMTON. Quite an amount for replacing ties.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alaska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were—ayes 2, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the fiscal year 1924 there shall be covered into the appropriation established from time to time under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, the proceeds of the sale of material utilized for temporary work and structures in connection with the operations under said act, as well as the sales of all other condemned property which has been purchased or constructed under the provisions thereof; also any moneys refunded in connection with the construction and operations under said act, and a report hereunder shall be made to Congress at the beginning of its next session: Provided, That the aggregate amount credited to such appropriation under the authority contained in this paragraph shall not exceed $100,000; Provided, That not more than $75,000 of the amounts covered into the said appropriation in the fiscal years 1923 and 1924 is hereby made immediately available for purchase or construction of a river steamer and necessary barges for operation on the Yukon River and its tributaries.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to the last proviso in order to ask a question. The Shipping Board could not supply these vessels?

Mr. CRAMTON. That inquiry was made, but the draft that is possible for use in the river is such that we were advised that nothing of the kind could be done.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of maintenance and operation of river steamers and other boats on the Yukon River and its tributaries in Alaska, including the purchase and repair of necessary machinery and apparatus, and the construction or rental of docking facilities (less revenues), $50,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, should there not be a correction in line 11 after the word "construction"? My print of the bill seems to read "construction of rental."

Mr. CRAMTON. It should be made clear that it is "construction or rental," and I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk make the necessary correction.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the various amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13559 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13180. An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13316. An act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13232. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. KAHN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. DRANE, indefinitely, on account of the death of his son.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 30, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

856. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the subsistence and purchase of lands for Apache Indians of Oklahoma lately confined as prisoners of war at the Fort Sill Military Reservation, $42,500 (H. Doc. No. 520); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GILLETT (by request): A bill (H. R. 13603) to provide for the world-wide extension of education by the cooperation of national governments; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 13604) for the erection of a Federal building at Elizabethtown, Hardin County, Ky.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HILL: A bill (H. R. 13605) validating the appointment of retired enlisted men to civil offices with compensation of $2,500 or more per annum; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 13606) to suspend the requirement of annual assessment work on unpatented mining claims during the years commencing July 1, 1922, and ending July 1, 1924; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 13607) to provide for the erection of an addition to and the remodeling of the Federal building in the city of Janesville, county of Rock, and State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 13608) to stimulate trade by providing credit to enable Germany to purchase foodstuffs and raw materials in the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. VAILE: A bill (H. R. 13609) to amend an act entitled "An act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and adjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis," approved June 5, 1920; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. FESS: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 417) in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War; to the Committee on the Library.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 13610) granting a pension to James Warner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 13611) granting a pension to Elijah C. Waln; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 13612) authorizing the issuance of patent to the legal representatives of Miles J. Davis, deceased; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13613) authorizing the cancellation of the Indian trust patent which issued to Justine Sayers; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13614) for the relief of Wyatt A. Marshall; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

6696. By Mr. CRAMTON: Petition signed by J. H. Kemp and other citizens of Unionville, Mich., urging the abolishment of the discriminatory tax on small arms, ammunition, and firearms; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6697. By Mr. CONNOLLY of Pennsylvania: Petition of the Frankford Grocers' Association, of Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., urging the enactment of legislation providing for a 1-cent rate of postage on drop letters in cities, towns, and on rural routes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

6710. Also, petition of H. E. Wells and others, Sussex, N. J., to abolish discriminatory tax on small-arms ammunition and firearms (sec. 900, par. 7, internal revenue bill); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6711. Also, petition of T. L. Riggin and others, Haskell, N. J., to abolish discriminatory tax on small-arms ammunition and firearms (sec. 900, par. 7, internal revenue bill); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6712. By Mr. WINSLOW: Petition of the Congregational Woman's Home Missionary Federation, New York, N. Y., relative to the Near East situation; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 30, 1922.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, December 27, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	McCumber	Sheppard
Borah	France	McKellar	Smoot
Brandegee	Gerry	McKinley	Spencer
Brookhart	Hale	McNary	Stanfield
Bursum	Harreld	Moses	Sterling
Cameron	Harris	Nelson	Sutherland
Capper	Heflin	New	Townsend
Caraway	Johnson	Nicholson	Trammell
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Underwood
Culberson	Kellogg	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Keyes	Page	Warren
Curtis	King	Phipps	Watson
Dial	Ladd	Poindexter	Williams
Dillingham	La Follette	Pomerene
Ernst	Lenroot	Reed, Mo.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is absent, due to illness in his family.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] is detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is necessarily absent on account of a death in his family.

Mr. PAGE. I was requested to state that the Committee on Banking and Currency is holding a very important hearing, at which three members of the Cabinet are present, and that if necessary to constitute a quorum the members of the committee will come to the Chamber; otherwise they ask to be excused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

EXCESS EARNINGS OF RAILROADS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 379, submitted by Mr. CAPPER and agreed to December 15, 1922, information relative to the determination and recovery of excess railway operating income, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 13180. An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13316. An act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13232. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHIPPS presented resolutions adopted by Henry W. Lawton Camp, United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Colorado and Wyoming, protesting against the action of the Board of Review, Bureau of Pensions, in rejecting claims filed under the act of June 5, 1920, for pensions on account of disability, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON presented, in the nature of a memorial, a letter from the Federal Cartridge Corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the discriminatory tax in existing law upon small-arms ammunition, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions of the board of directors of the Cokeville (Wyo.) National Farm Loan Association, favoring the enactment of legislation amending certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, especially relative to the present loan limit, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LADD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jamestown, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation repealing the discriminatory tax on small-arms ammunition and firearms, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 29, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 3295) to consolidate the work of collecting, compiling, and publishing statistics of the foreign commerce of the United States in the Department of Commerce.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 4249) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920; to the Committee on Civil Service.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4250) for the relief of Frank P. Trott; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 4251) for the disposition of refractory lands on the Huntley irrigation project, in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4252) providing for a commissioned status to sanitary engineers in the Public Health Service of the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 262) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRANSACTIONS OF EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution asking for certain information from the Shipping Board, which I ask to have printed and lie upon the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 388) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Shipping Board is hereby directed to report to the Senate the names of all officers and employees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, together with a statement of the salary or compensation which is paid to each of them; a list of all persons who have received passes or gratuitous transportation on vessels operated by or for the account of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, with particulars as to the voyages made by such persons and the relations such persons have to the Shipping Board or to any of its officers or employees, together with a statement of the regular passage fares which would have been charged for such voyages; a statement of all charter parties, general or special, entered into for or on behalf of the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board since January 1, 1920, with particulars as to the vessels covered by such charter parties, the voyages made, cargo tons carried inbound and outbound, the amount of revenues received and the expense accounts allowed, together with a statement of all allowances for entertainments and the cost of any intoxicating liquors, and of all amounts of money paid under such charter parties, and to whom paid; a statement of all moneys which had been paid at any time for advertising publicity or propaganda; and a statement containing a complete list of all the vessels at any time owned or controlled by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the gross tonnage of every such vessel, the date of acquisition of every such vessel, the parties from whom such vessels were acquired, whether by contract for construction, requisition, or seizure, the amount of money paid for every such vessel, the amount of money spent upon every such vessel since acquisition, the disposition of every such vessel, and if sold or transferred, the amount of money received by the Shipping Board for such vessel, and a statement of the present status of every such vessel, giving its location and the use or service, if any, to which such vessel is subjected.

MERGER AND ORGANIZATION OF MEAT-PACKING CORPORATIONS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a Senate resolution. I desire to have it read and then referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The resolution (S. Res. 389) was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press that Armour & Co., one of the five largest meat-packing corporations in the world, is forming a corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware with a capital stock of $160,000,000, with the announced purpose of taking over the interests of said corporation in Chicago, Ill., and elsewhere; and

Whereas it is common knowledge that negotiations have been pending for some time between said Armour & Co. and Morris & Co., another one of the five largest meat-packing establishments in the world, with the avowed purpose of the merging of said meat-packing corporations under the name of Armour & Co.; and

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press that the total amount of stocks and bonds to be issued upon the combining of said corporations is very materially in excess of the amount of property involved; and

Whereas the carrying out of such proposed merger of two of the largest packing establishments in the world is liable to be detrimental to the public interests and to unlawfully restrain trade (1) in that such merger will tend further to limit the number of large purchasers of live stock from farmers and producers, and (2) will very materially reduce competition in the production of meats and packing-house products and thereby tend to increase the cost of living to the consumers of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to make a full and complete investigation of the organization of said proposed corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware, and also of the proposed merger of the said two corporations, and report to the Senate whether the organization of said corporation and the combining of said corporations are in violation of law and to what extent, if any, the carrying out of such merger will tend to eliminate competition in the purchase of live stock and to increase the cost of living to the consumers.

RETAIL PRICE OF SHOES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the request of George M. Spangler, secretary-commissioner of the National Shoe Retailers' Association of the United States of America (Inc.), I ask that this letter addressed to me, dated December 21, 1922, be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL SHOE RETAILERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA (INC.), Chicago, December 21, 1922.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Senator from Utah, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Our attention has been called to an article appearing in the Denver Post of December 17, 1922, in which you are quoted as stating that you bought a pair of shoes for Mrs. Smoot for which you paid $17, and that in a Salt Lake City hotel you were told by a traveling shoe salesman that these identical shoes sold for $5.75 all over the United States.

The National Shoe Retailers' Association, by virtue of its direct and constant contact with shoe retailers throughout this country, definitely knows that whoever told you that these shoes retailing for $17 could be purchased for $5.75 told you a positive falsehood, because we know that such conditions do not and could not exist.

Now, as an individual, certainly you are at perfect liberty to be convinced on insufficient proof or say so, but in your official capacity it does seem that a United States Senator should be certain of his ground before he voices such a statement.

We would like to ask you for the name of whoever vouched for the statement you have made, which statement carries such a gross injustice to the shoe-retailing industry of our country.

During January, February, and March of 1922, in conjunction with the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, Hon. SYDNEY ANDERSON, chairman, the National Shoe Retailers' Association, made an exhaustive inquiry, country wide, embracing shoe stores, large and small, as to costs, turnover, and profits, and the results of that exhaustive inquiry are now a matter of record, tabulated over a period of seven years, arranged according to Federal trade districts, established by percentages, and accepted by Congress. These figures show that the average net profit over a period of seven years is 6.17 per cent.

We know through facts and provable figures that the retail shoe dealer of the United States is not a profiteer and we have so proved to the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, have been given a clean bill of health from that unjust charge, and it is certainly a gross injustice to have one of your standing and in your official capacity to publicly voice such an erroneous statement.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE M. SPANGLER, Secretary.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], which will be read.

The READING CLERK. On page 9 it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, in the following words:

OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.

For employees in the Office of Naval Intelligence, $30,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except two persons at $2,000 each.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In this connection I ask to have printed in the RECORD upon the subject of the amendment a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the letter will be received and printed.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
ASSISTANT SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 28, 1922.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Office of Naval Intelligence is primarily charged with the functions enumerated below. I have divided them into peace and war-time activities, because you can see that necessarily war conditions would engender situations which would have to be met in a different manner.

PEACE-TIME ACTIVITIES.

Collection and classification of information from abroad and at home for the use of the Navy Department in peace and in war.

Publication and dissemination of such information for use of Government officials requiring it.

Direction of the Navy Department library and historical section.

Direction of all United States naval attachés abroad.

Official channel of communication with all foreign naval attachés in the United States.

Direction of naval missions of an educational character in foreign countries.

Direction of the intelligence officers attached to ships and stations.

Maintenance of close touch of all naval activities both in and out of the Navy Department.

WAR-TIME ACTIVITIES.

In time of war these duties are extended to the assistance of other departments in discovering and bringing to justice persons engaging in activities against the United States.

Censorship of cables and radios.

Protection of industrial plants.

Ship inspection.

Supervision of passports.

The Office of Naval Intelligence has no detective force or police force for the investigation or prevention of crime. The commandant of the naval district has an intelligence officer who collects naval information for the Office of Naval Intelligence, and who, in the performance of this duty, does occasionally discover matters which should be and are promptly brought to the attention of the Department of Justice, which has jurisdiction in such cases.

Naval Intelligence in peace time has no duties connected with guarding Government property or preventing theft. However, it cooperates closely with the Department of Justice and gives to that department every assistance possible in the detection of crime pertaining to the naval service.

With reference to the article appearing in the public press on December 20, quoted on the floor of the Senate, to the effect that there had been thefts in the New York naval district of naval stores amounting to about $1,000,000, the facts are as follows: The value of thefts disclosed are in the neighborhood of $1,500. The indictments found by the grand jury charge conspiracy and theft of materials of a total value of about $2,100 only. The articles apparently stolen include paints, paint brushes, clothing, books, cloth cuttings, towels, and provisions.

The value of materials stored in the New York naval district is over $50,000,000. A running inventory of these materials is maintained throughout the year. Owing to the great amount of material on hand and to the consequent possibility of small peculations, the officers of the naval district decided last August that it would be good policy to ask the Department of Justice agents to undertake an investigation along this line. The statement made in the article which refers to the Office of Naval Intelligence is entirely without foundation. They were in no way concerned in the matter. As a consequence of the report of the agents of the Department of Justice 23 persons were indicted by the grand jury under the direction of the district attorney, were arrested, and are now held for trial or have been bailed awaiting trial. The amounts we have established as involved are those I have mentioned above.

Considering the amount of supplies on hand and the extensive nature of the transactions, I feel that this record compares favorably with that of any private concern so situated.

Yours very truly, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] had offered an amendment which was pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was just voted upon.

Mr. KING. That was the amendment relative to the Naval Intelligence Office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was the pending amendment that was voted on.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator from Tennessee offered another amendment last night.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I believe the Naval Intelligence amendment was the pending amendment. I now offer the amendment which the Secretary has on his desk providing for a reduction of 19,000 in the enlisted personnel of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 30, line 8, add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the enlisted personnel of the Navy shall not exceed 67,000 men.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment or two in explanation of the amendment which I have offered.

My amendment provides that the number of enlisted men in the Navy shall be 67,000 instead of 86,000, as provided by the bill. I am a friend of the Navy. I think I have voted for every bill looking to the building up and maintaining of our Navy. I am loath to disagree with the report of the committee in this case, and I want to stop here long enough to say that I do not blame the officers of the Navy at all, and the officials of the Navy Department, for desiring to build up the Navy and making it as great as possible. They show a fine spirit in so acting, and I wish more of the departments would take a live and active interest in their own department affairs. If we had had the same activity and determination to win in behalf of the building up of our merchant marine on the part of the Shipping Board, for instance, as we have in charge of the Navy Department in the building up of the Navy, we would have a very much better merchant marine.

So I have no word of criticism of the Navy Department for wanting the 86,000 men. But I want to point out to the Senate very briefly the reasons why we ought not to appropriate for 86,000. A committee of the House carefully examined into this matter about a year ago, and reported that 67,000 were ample to man all of our ships and do all of the shore duty necessary, and upon the motion of Mr. VARE, of Pennsylvania, in the House, I believe, the report of the committee was overturned, and the House fixed the number at 86,000 men. The committee made a thorough examination, and its report is unanswerable. The House was in error in overturning it. The department does not need the men appropriated for. If war was actually on we would have more men on our capital ships than were originally designed for those ships when the ships were built.

Mr. President, when I say to the Senate that the United States Navy will have this year, if this bill passes, 86,000 men, and that the British Navy proper has only 84,000 men, I think it ought to be apparent to everyone that we have more men in our peace-time establishment in the Navy than we ought to have. Surely, whatever else may be said of Great Britain, she understands how to maintain her navy. Ordinarily I think it might be well conceded that the British Navy is about one-third larger, or nearly one-third larger, than the American Navy. Why should the American Government, with a Navy so much smaller, have, at this enormous expense, even more enlisted men in her Navy than they have in the British fleet?

Mr. President, we have 2,186 more enlisted men assigned to the 18 capital ships which we have under the treaty which was the result of the peace conference than Great Britain had to a like number and a like kind of capital ships, even in 1918, when the greatest war in all the history of the world was going on. Why is it necessary, I ask, for us, with this enormous burden of taxation upon the people, to tax ourselves for this 19,000 additional men for whose maintenance there has been no reason offered?

The cost of enlisted men is a very great cost. According to the experts, the cost of these 19,000 men will amount to about $30,000,000. This amendment, if adopted, will cut off about $30,000,000 from the appropriation. We are appropriating in this bill something like $325,000,000 for our Navy, and up to the time of the Great War in 1914 Germany never spent as much as $200,000,000 on her navy. Great Britain spent but very little more than that at any one time and the United States never spent over about $147,000,000 for her Navy. Now, when President Harding said in his message, just a few days ago, that there was not a war cloud in sight, we are taxing the American people in the enormous sum of $325,000,000 for the maintenance of our Navy for one year, and that, too, in spite of the limitation of armament agreement. It was loudly claimed for the disarmament conference that it would reduce the cost of naval armament. If this bill goes through as reported, we might as well admit that the disarmament conference was of no value. Certainly it did not reduce our appropriations for our Navy. They are just as large or larger this year than last, and I see that Great Britain, France, and Italy are likewise appropriating vast sums for their armies and navies. Evidently the reduction of armament conference was a failure.

As everyone in the Senate knows, I voted for the four-power pact. I was criticized somewhat for that, but I said, in answer to the criticism, that it was at least a part of what I had contended for in advocating the League of Nations; that if we could not get all we asked for, I was glad to get a part of it; that if we got a four-power pact in the Far East, we might be able to make a pact later on for the Near East, and in that way, a part at a time, eventually secure the peace of the world. In addition to that, I stated that it would mean a reduction of taxation to the American people, I thought, if we limited our armament. Yet we find no reduction of taxation for the maintenance of our Navy. There is some reduction for building, but the same enormous amount of over $300,000,000, or something like $325,000,000, for the Navy.

I think it is the part of wisdom, I think it is the part of prudence, I know it is the part of proper economy to reduce the number from 86,000 to 67,000 men. That is ample for all purposes, and we would save about $30,000,000 on that account.

For these reasons I have offered the amendment, and I hope the Senate will adopt it. I think it ought to be adopted. I think we ought to give some concern to this. What has become of the boasted limitation of armament if it is going to cost the American people just as much for our Navy in the future as it has cost them in the past? Prior to 1916 we never spent over about $147,000,000 for the Navy, and only in later years that much. If it is going to be more than double that in the future, what good has been the limitation of armament? I voted wrong when I voted for it. I probably made a mistake when I voted for it, if it is not going to have the effect, which Senators claimed for it and which I claimed for it at the time, of reducing the cost of maintaining our Navy.

Mr. President, it seems to me it is better for the Congress not to put this enormous unnecessary burden upon the American people to keep up the Navy, and I regret very much that the Senator in charge of the bill is not willing to accept my amendment. It ought to be adopted, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. In addition to the observations which he submitted, I want to call attention to the fact that out of the entire number of 86,000 men provided for in the bill, which does not include the number of officers, nearly 30,000 are employed upon shore or in shore duty or in work which does not take them upon the ships. My recollection is that the number required to man the ships, as provided for in the five-power treaty, was 52,000. Now, it seems to me that to have such a large number, nearly 30,000, on shore is not required and constitutes an unnecessary burden upon the taxpayers.

I find some criticism of that policy in the hearings. Some questions propounded during the House committee hearings indicate there was not complete approval of the policy which retains such a large number of men upon shore. Certainly there could be a reduction of at least 15,000 for shore duty, leaving 52,000 for manning the ships; and that would give approximately the number called for in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, all this talk about reduction in the expenses of the Navy, to use the language of the street, is "moonshine."

I have gone over this bill very carefully item by item, contrasting the appropriations herein called for with the appropriations made for the current year, and a comparison will clearly demonstrate that there have been no economies worked out in the Navy Department and in the administration of the activities of that department. In the first place, this bill calls for not $294,000,000 or $295,000,000, as the report indicates, but it calls for more than $325,000,000; how much more it is impossible to determine.

May I say, Mr. President, that I deem such a method of appropriating money exceedingly impolitic and certainly misleading? Any person reading the report of the committee or examining in a cursory way the bill itself and its provisions would not be clearly apprised of the fact that more than $325,000,000 are carried in appropriations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is nothing in the report of the Senate committee that justifies the statement of the Senator from Utah. I presume that the report to which he is referring is the report of the House committee, which is incorporated, as the report of the House committee, in the report of the Senate committee. Personally, I think that the House committee report points out very clearly and specifically all the matters to which the Senator from Utah is referring.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I read from the report submitted by the distinguished Senator from Washington, who has just interrupted me:

> Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 13374:
> The Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, reports the same to the Senate with various amendments, and presents herewith information relative to the changes made.

Amount of bill as passed House	$293,806,538
Amount added by Senate	1,797,840
Amount of bill as reported to Senate	295,604,378

Mr. President, I submit that that statement is not accurate. The amount that is appropriated by this bill, directly and indirectly, is considerably in excess of the figures which I last stated and which I read from the report submitted by the Senator from Washington. As a matter of fact, this bill carries, directly and indirectly, appropriations of over $325,000,000.

Mr. President, we have from time to time since I have been in the Senate condemned the practice of making appropriations in an indirect and uncertain way. No one knows how much will be expended under this bill in excess of the amount stated in the report, although it is conceded that a critical examination of the report and the bill, together with supplemental figures which may be obtained, will reveal the fact that at least $325,000,000 are carried directly and indirectly.

The fair and proper method of dealing with these appropriations so that we may know from year to year the amount which is appropriated is to state directly in language which is unmistakable exactly what is appropriated.

This bill authorizes the disposition of certain properties and the application of the proceeds derived therefrom to certain activities provided for in the bill. How much will be realized from the sources just indicated can not, as I understand the facts, be accurately determined.

Then, Mr. President, authority is given in the bill to resort to funds heretofore appropriated and unexpended, from which may be subtracted millions of dollars; how much I am not able accurately to determine; but, as I have submitted, the amount will be in excess of $325,000,000. Mr. President, anyone picking up the committee report and examining it will reach the conclusion that we are appropriating less than $300,000,000, whereas the fact is that this bill carries more than $325,000,000. I charge that the report in that respect is misleading. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee, the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is so familiar with appropriations and has exerted himself in an effort to give clarity and definiteness to appropriation bills, would protest against this plan.

I should like to know just exactly what is being appropriated. If we deem the amount specifically named of two hundred and ninety-odd million dollars inadequate, let us state what further sum shall be appropriated. If there are funds undisposed of in some of the bureaus or executive agencies of the Government, instead of giving authority to resort to those indefinite funds we ought to determine just what amount is needed to supplement the direct appropriation made and make another specific appropriation covering what we deem to be necessary——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Just a moment—and then provide that those indefinite sums unexpended by agencies or bureaus of the department shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States. In that way we would have an intelligent grasp of the appropriations made and we would know something definite as to the fiscal policies and the fiscal affairs of the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator point out any language of the bill that carries any indefinite appropriation?

Mr. KING. The Senator admitted——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, there can not be anything used except what is authorized by the law. When this bill becomes a law no money can be used under it except as authorized by the language of the bill. If the Senator will point to anything in the bill that is justly subject to the censure which he has just directed toward it, I shall be very much more enlightened by his suggestion.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator does not this bill authorize the application to various purposes of funds which may be derived from the sale of governmental property?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does, and in doing so refutes the statement the Senator has just made about indefinite appropriations. It does it specifically and definitely to the extent of $450,000. The particular property is mentioned and the purposes for which the proceeds are to be used are provided for in the bill.

Mr. KING. In the first place, it is not certain as to the amount which will be realized from the sale of the property. What ought to be done is to sell the property and cover the proceeds into the Treasury, and if an additional appropriation is required either in a deficiency bill or in this bill itself provision should be made for the additional amount.

May I inquire further of the Senator if it is not a fact that this bill contains a provision which will enable the Navy Department to resort to various funds which have not as yet been exhausted?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it contains an express authorization for the use, for the purposes for which such funds have been appropriated, of the unexpended balances in those funds, and thereby is absolutely definite and specific. There is nothing concealed about it.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, the conclusion which the Senator draws, in my opinion, is not quite warranted by the facts. The Senator can not tell now just what funds are at the disposal of various bureaus and agencies upon which drafts may be made at some time during the next fiscal year.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why does the Senator say that? I do not know what warrant the Senator has for saying that I can not state the amounts.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can get the exact figures down to cents for the Senator if he desires them. The mere fact that the Senator can not get them is no indication that the facts do not exist.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator now know what is the unexpended balance in each fund that was created, and does he know what that unexpended balance will be on the 30th of June?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I do not know what they will be on the 30th of June, but I have the information as to what they are now, and that is what we are referring to in this bill. They can not be any more on the 30th of June; they are bound to be less on the 30th of June than they are now, because some portion of the funds, probably, will be expended between now and then. They amount to about $2,000,000. I will give the Senator the exact figures.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator advise the Senate now of the sources from which he expects the Navy Department under this bill will be permitted to draw during the coming fiscal year?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes, I will advise the Senate, but it is such an obvious matter that I think the Senate probably is already advised—that is, those Members of the Senate who have read the bill and taken an interest in the matter. I mentioned a moment ago two of them; one of them is $450,000 for ordnance. There is an authorization to use the money that is derived from the sale of ordnance materials to the extent of $450,000. That is one item. The other one is the authorization for the use of $35,000,000 for carrying on the construction of the ships in which the Government is now engaged, which is to be taken from a fund which contains something over $200,000,000, that fund being known as the "general supply account fund." It was considered by the House and considered by the Senate committee not to be advisable to keep a fund of that size unused out of the Treasury and subject to the purposes for which the "general supply account fund" was established, and so they proceeded to reduce that fund by authorizing the use of $35,000,000 of it, as is specified in the bill in the most definite and specific language, in order, without the necessity of stopping work and starting it again or discharging men and employing them again, which always entails extravagant waste and unnecessary expense, to proceed economically and continuously with the work upon the ships to which the Government is committed and which are now in process of construction. All of that is pointed out in the report and all of it is set forth in very definite language by the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask if the $200,000,000 that the Senator says is now in the fund is held under the title "Increase of the Navy"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The fund is not held under that title. It is held under the title of "General supply account fund of the Navy," but the authorization of the use of portions of it is under the head in the bill of "Increase of the Navy."

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Utah to the language on page 53 of the bill, under the head "Increase of the Navy":

The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "Increase of the Navy," together with the sum of $19,097,000—

As amended by the Senate—

which is hereby appropriated, for the prosecution of work on vessels under construction on such date—

And so forth. If there are $200,000,000 in that fund, evidently this language would reappropriate all of the $200,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am trying to get information. I do not know what that means unless it means what I have said, and I shall be glad to have any information from the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am undertaking to give the Senator such information as I have in regard to it. The language which the Senator has just read does not refer to that fund at all. It has no effect on it. It appropriates nothing out of it. It refers to unexpended balances, which is the language of the section, and which could not mean anything except what it says.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator asked me to give him information. I may not have as much as I ought to have, but if he will just permit me for half a minute to proceed to give him such information as I have I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so, because that is what I want to know.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What the Senator is talking about is contained in another part of the bill. The language which he has just read had nothing whatever to do with it. If the Senator will turn to page 54 of the bill, line 25, he will find the language which covers the subject which he is talking about; that is—

Provided, That in addition to the funds hereinbefore made available for "increase of the Navy" the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make transfers during the fiscal year 1924 from the naval supply account fund and the clothing and small stores fund to the appropriation "increase of the Navy" of sums aggregating $35,000,000.

That is what I referred to a moment ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I noted that, and I note that that is a proviso, a limitation on the preceding part of that section. The general language reappropriates all the money in that fund, and this is a limitation to $35,000,000. I may be in error, but this language on page 53 is the principal part of that section and the part to which the proviso is merely a proviso or limitation; and unless I am greatly mistaken the whole $200,000,000—if the Senator says there is that much in that fund—is reappropriated in this language:

The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "increase of the Navy," together with the sum of $19,097,000.

That reappropriates it all for some purpose. The $35,000,000 in the proviso on pages 54 and 55 is a limitation to the statement that I have just read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has done a remarkable thing in discovering here, just while he is arguing the bill, a construction of it which nobody on the committee of the House of Representatives—which contains a lot of very able men, who devote their entire time to that matter—and nobody on the Senate committee, and nobody in the Navy Department has ever discovered. It is quite a startling fact if it is a fact, but I do not see how anybody could possibly give that construction to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say in reply to that, if the Senator from Utah will permit me——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ought not to have taken so much of the Senator's time, but if he will permit me I will say in answer that I had no idea—there was nothing in the report to show—there were in this fund $200,000,000 of unexpended balances. If there are, as the Senator from Washington has just told us, $200,000,000 of unexpended balances in this fund, then this language reappropriates it—there can not be any question about that—and the Navy Department can use it. There can be no question about that, and the language here reappropriates that money, whatever the committee or whatever the Senator might have thought about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator point out the language which reappropriates it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course. I have read it twice, and I will read it again.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just read the words.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will read it. I have read it twice, and I will read it again:

The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "increase of the Navy," together with the sum of $19,097,000—

And that takes in all of the unappropriated balances.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has just read language which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to use unexpended balances under appropriations heretofore made on account of increase of the Navy. There can not be any mistake about that language.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. "Unexpended balances * * * under appropriations heretofore made on account of 'increase of the Navy'" is the language used.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, just permit me for half a moment. The fund which the Senator is talking about is not an appropriation for increase of the Navy, and so it can not be affected in any way whatever by the language which he has just read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just asked the Senator that very question, and the Senator stated, in answer to a previous question of mine, that the $200,000,000 was under that fund.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or I so understood him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not make any such statement. I stated the contrary.

Mr. McKELLAR. The report does not refer to it in any way in the world and it seems to me it ought to refer to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that the explanation of the Senator from Washington, while doubtless clear to others, is not very lucid so far as I am concerned. I had in mind the same point which the Senator from Tennessee has just submitted. I read, and I ask the permission of the Senate to read again, the language which he has read, namely:

The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "Increase of the Navy."

Now the Senator calls attention to another provision, found on page 55, namely:

That in addition to the funds hereinbefore made available for "Increase of the Navy," the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make transfers during the fiscal year 1924 from the naval supply account fund and the clothing and small stores fund to the appropriation "Increase of the Navy" of sums aggregating $35,000,000.

It may be, although that is not clear, that there are two funds, one denominated "Increase of the Navy," which contains a large unexpended balance, and another fund from which $35,000,000 may be drawn under the authorization found on page 55. I should like to ask the Senator whether there are two funds from which drafts may be made by the Secretary of the Navy; whether he may use all the unexpended balances found in the account entitled "Increase of the Navy," and also $35,000,000 from the fund referred to on page 55?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, certainly not. As I just explained in a colloquy with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the fund referred to on pages 53, 54, and 55—to use the Senator's designation of it—is not an appropriation for increase of the Navy, and so language in the bill authorizing the use of unexpended balances under appropriations for increase of the Navy could have no effect at all on it.

Mr. KING. I do not know that I fully comprehend the Senator's meaning. I should like to ask him so that we may get an understanding, what funds there are now unexpended under the head "Increase of the Navy." Certainly there are some funds under that bookkeeping title employed by the Navy Department, or this language would not be found in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose it might be called a fund, but the Senator has already designated it. It is money appropriated for increase of the Navy. It is referred to as a balance. It is not ordinarily referred to as a fund. There are certain more or less permanent funds, one of which is the fund of the naval supply account, another of which is the clothing and small-stores fund, and neither one of those is an appropriation for increase of the Navy. The Senator can see by the necessary implication of the language that they could not have any relation to increase of the Navy.

Mr. KING. I am inquiring of the Senator what funds or balances now exist under the technical title "Increase of the Navy" which would be appropriated by the language found on page 53?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am informed that there will be nothing at all. As I said a moment ago, I can not tell exactly what will be expended between now and the 1st of July, the end of the fiscal year; but I am informed by the Navy Department that at the present rate of expenditure all the money that was appropriated last year will be exhausted by the end of the fiscal year, so that there will be nothing left in the balance for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, obviously the committee thought that something would be available, because they use this language:

> The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act.

There must have been something in contemplation. The figures in the department must have shown that in the latter part of December, 1922, or the beginning of January, 1923, there would be some balance in the fund labeled "Increase of the Navy." What I am trying to get at is, what amount did the committee think they were appropriating by the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They thought they were appropriating anything that would be left in that fund at the end of the fiscal year, if there was anything left. The Senator says there must be something left. He is perfectly welcome to assume that if he wants to. If there is anything left, it will be carried by this appropriation; but I repeat to the Senator—this is the best information that is available—that at the present rate of expenditure, and under the commitments which have been made, the Navy Department is of the opinion that there will be nothing left in that fund at the end of the fiscal year. The Senator says there must be something left in it. If he chooses to act on his assumption that there must be something left, I have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator plays with words and, it seems to me—and I say that with all due kindness—is not quite frank in the presentation of this matter. I stated that the committee obviously must have felt that there would be something in the fund, some balance, or they would not have made the appropriation; but let me say to the Senator that the committee do not employ the language "at the end of the fiscal year." The bill provides: "The Secretary * * * may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act." Now, what I am trying to get at is this——

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is a very able lawyer, and it ought not to be necessary for me to explain to him a simple matter such as the fact that it is not necessary to insert a provision in this bill to authorize the expenditure of funds the expenditure of which has already been authorized by the appropriation act of last year, which covers the period of the fiscal year up to June 30, 1923. The appropriations carried in the pending bill are for the fiscal year 1924, and the authorization carried in this bill for the use of unexpended balances is to cover the period of time not covered by last year's act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is not the language of the bill, of course. The language of the bill is that any unexpended balances appearing in that fund at the date of the approval of this act are appropriated. The Senator from Washington is a very able lawyer and a very wise legislator, and I am sure that not only his State but the country will suffer materially by not having his able services here in the future. But may I ask the Senator, if it be a fact that this language was intended to apply only after the expiration of the fiscal year, why was the language employed that the appropriation should be of any balance found in the fund "at the date of the approval of this act"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Because the act could not have any effect until the date of the approval of it. It was to cover all of the funds in existence when the act went into effect. It should not be necessary to explain that, and I think the Senator really understands it. I do not know whether the Senator is asking these questions in good faith or not. Of course, the purpose of specifying the date of the approval of the act was to specify the amount of money that was in the fund at the time the act became effective.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield to me, I would like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill two questions, and I assure him they are both asked in good faith. The first of these questions is this: Is the entire sum of $200,000,000, which the Senator said was in some fund, all reappropriated by this bill, or is only $35,000,000 reappropriated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The $35,000,000 is not appropriated, because it has already been appropriated, but a transfer of the fund is authorized to the extent of $35,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand, there will be $165,000,000 unexpended in the department which are not reappropriated by this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whatever the balance is. The figures which I gave as to the amount in the fund now may not be exact—they are only approximate; but there will be left in the fund all except the $35,000,000, the transfer of which is authorized by this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I understand that in a general fund the unexpended balances now in the hands of the Navy Department are about $200,000,000; that $35,000,000 of that $200,000,000 is reappropriated, and on July 1 the other $165,000,000, or thereabouts—of course, I am not speaking accurately of the amount, nor is the Senator, I assume—will be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. What will become of the $165,000,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It will remain just where it is now. It has already been appropriated. It is not in the general fund of the Navy. It is in the general supply account fund. The balance of that fund, other than the $35,000,000 which will be transferred if the bill passes, will remain just exactly where it is now, not being affected in any way whatever by this bill. In other words, it will remain in the general supply account fund for the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why is an unexpended balance of $165,000,000 left in the Treasury undisposed of and unused? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The object was to have a revolving fund of a considerable amount, especially during the war, out of which supplies, clothing, and small stores could be purchased and kept on hand by the department for the current uses of the department and to meet emergencies as they arose.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was a war measure, was it not? Why should we keep in the department a revolving fund of $165,000,000 in such an account? I am asking the Senator in good faith for information.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the criticism of the Senator from Tennessee is a very sound one—that this fund is too large, and ought to be reduced—and the transfer of $35,000,000, as authorized by this bill, is for the very purpose of reducing that fund. Of course, if the Senator wants to increase the amount transferred beyond that which is carried by this bill, so as to reduce the fund still further, I do not know that I would object to it, although I am inclined to think that the amount provided here for increase of the Navy is about all that can be economically expended during the next fiscal year.

Mr. McKELLAR. My purpose is not to add to the expenditures at all; I wish to cut down the expenditures as much as can reasonably be done and keep our Navy as it should be; but it does not appear from what the Senator says that that fund is any longer necessary; and, if that is so, why should it not be restored to the Treasury, in these times when taxes are so high and money is so scarce? It seems to me to be the part of wisdom to let that $165,000,000 be covered back into the Treasury on the 1st of July, or immediately upon the passage of this bill. I should think that would be the prudent way of legislating. If the Senator will yield just a moment, if I understand the contention of the Senator from Utah, which I think is well taken, it is that this habit of putting down actual appropriations from the Treasury at $294,000,000, say, as is carried in this bill in round numbers, and then reappropriating from large balances, or unstated balances, is a very poor way of legislating, and it seems to me those balances ought to be disposed of before we make other inroads on the Treasury to carry on the affairs of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator from Washington should challenge the good faith of anybody in propounding inquiries in regard to this bill. This is one of the most important of the appropriation bills, and but few Senators have given it attention and but limited information has been given the Senate concerning its provisions. There should be more inquiries and fuller discussion of its provisions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Especially in regard to this fund.

Mr. KING. It has been disclosed now that there is a revolving fund of $200,000,000 carried in the Navy Department. The Senator states that. I was not aware of the extent of the fund. It is disclosed now that instead of making a direct appropriation of $35,000,000 for naval construction, we authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subtract $35,000,000 from a revolving fund of $200,000,000. The form of the bill gives ground for the criticism that the entire amount carried by the bill is not clearly stated.

The committee reports $295,000,000 appropriated. But in the closing pages of the bill there is found an authorization to take $35,000,000 from a fund, which obviously increases the full amount in the bill to more than $325,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I recall, the newspapers all carried in their columns the statement that the amount appropriated for the Navy this year was about $294,000,000. It seems to me we ought to be fair with the people and disclose to them just exactly what is appropriated for each department so that they can understand it. Of course, if $35,000,000 or any other sum undisclosed is put in an appropriation bill and the people are not given knowledge of it, I do not think it is exactly fair.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me there is no necessity in peace times, in view of the fact that Congress is in almost constant session and in view of the fact that it responds so quickly to demands for deficiencies, to carry a revolving fund of $200,000,000 in the Navy Department. The Senator said that fund is used for supplies, and so forth, so that resort may be had to it in a contingency. We know that departments have been in the habit of creating deficiencies and then appealing to Congress to make appropriations to cover the same, but the Navy Department now, in peace times, knows approximately, indeed almost accurately, what its requirements will be for the year. It knows that if the amount appropriated is inadequate, resort may be had to Congress for relief.

It seems to me the committee ought to have reported as a part of this bill a provision covering a portion of this $200,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States. Then it ought to have frankly made an appropriation of $35,000,000, if that amount were deemed necessary, to aid in the constructive policy in which the Navy Department is engaged.

Moreover, it is demonstrated, from the concessions made by the Senator himself, that the fund first referred to on page 55, which is reappropriated, is not certain, and it is not known how much of that fund will be available at the date of the passage of this bill or at the end of the fiscal year. The Senator states that from present information there will be nothing left in the fund. We do not know whether the information of the Senator is correct or not. There may be a considerable amount left at the end of the year. Whatever it is, much or little, is carried by this bill, and to that extent the bill is indefinite as to the appropriations made.

I submit again that as to that fund there ought to be a provision that whatever balance exists on the 30th of June, the end of the fiscal year, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Utah, who is on the committee and who can probably answer it. If he can not, I would like to have the acting chairman of the committee answer it. There has been a great deal of property sold by the Navy, supplies which were accumulated during the war and for which they have no use now. I do not know to what extent they have such supplies, but I know quite a large amount of supplies are still on hand in the Navy which they are from time to time selling, as the newspapers report. What I want to know is, does the money coming from those sales go into one of these funds, this revolving fund or some other fund, or is it covered into the Treasury? I would be glad to have the Senator's view on that, if he has the information. If he has not, I would like to know from the Senator in charge of the bill whether the proceeds of sales of property by the Navy Department are covered into the Treasury or whether they go into one of these funds.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to yield to the acting chairman of the committee to answer that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the question was addressed to the Senator from Utah, and I did not catch the question in full.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to have either Senator answer, or to have anyone else answer who has the information.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The proceeds of those sales are listed under the head of "Miscellaneous receipts" and are covered into the Treasury.

Mr. KING. I invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to another fact, which will be brought in an acute form to his attention, I feel sure, before the adjournment of Congress. We have been regaled frequently by those who have been indulging in constant panegyrics upon the beneficent results of the Washington conference, that the cost of maintaining the Navy was to be reduced. The American people were led to believe that they were to be relieved of a very large burden as a result of the Limitation of Armament Conference. I warn the Senator from Tennessee that before the adjournment of Congress appeals will be made for an appropriation of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 more to "modernize," to use the expression employed, our battleships.

We are being given the naval appropriations in piecemeal. The aggregate amount will thus not appear so large—or at least the country will not receive the shock which the entire amount would create. We will be asked to appropriate $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 more. Already an appeal has been made to the Budget Committee, and I think the Budget Committee has presented the matter to the President and his Cabinet, and in order to modernize the battleships we will doubtless be asked to authorize a stupendous appropriation in addition to the large appropriations carried in the pending bill and heretofore made. The appropriation authorized and carried by the bill and the appropriation which doubtless will be submitted will therefore amount to approximately $400,000,000 for the current year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean the appropriation is to be made for the purpose of modernizing the 18 capital ships which we were allowed under the program of the Disarmament Conference?

Mr. KING. Some or all; I do not know exactly which ones are to be "modernized."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is something new.

Mr. KING. I said to the Senator it would be brought to his attention in an acute way before the Congress adjourns. I want to say now to some of our navalistic friends that there may be some difficulty in forcing through the Senate of the United States a proposition of that kind during the present session.

The people are being deluded by the constant reiteration that naval expenses have been greatly reduced. As a matter of fact the naval appropriations carried by this bill and by the current year measure is more than double the amount appropriated in either 1912, 1913, 1914, or 1915. The Senator from Washington said the Washington conference had effected a reduction of approximately $180,000,000 in the execution of the 1916 naval program. Of course, it is known that the conference dealt only with capital ships. Yet we will have, and I think that the truth of the statement will soon be made apparent to the public, a request for $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 to change ships already built. The American people will realize, if they have not already realized, that the benefits of the Washington conference have been greatly exaggerated and that the burdens created by the Navy will be much greater than at any time prior to the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in that connection will the Senator permit me to read a very short article which appeared in the morning Post?

Mr. KING. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. It looks as if not only America has the mania for enormous appropriations for war purposes but that our friends who joined in the disarmament conference last year have the same sort of views. I quote from the Post of this morning, including the headlines, as follows:

HUGE SUMS FOR ARMS TO BE SPENT BY EUROPE—ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND ITALY PREPARING HUGE ARMAMENT OUTLAY IN 1923.

[Special cable dispatch.]

PARIS, December 29.—The greatest paradox of modern times is found in the fact that the European nations, though ranging from financial depression to the verge of bankruptcy, still are preparing to spend billions of dollars on their armies and navies the coming year.

From reliable authorities in Paris, London, and Rome the following striking comparison of budget statistics for 1923 has been obtained:

France to-day owes 316,984,988,953 francs at home and abroad, of which 40,893,234,000 represents her debt to the United States and 33,983,117,000 her debts to other countries. Nevertheless the new budget to be voted next month calls for 3,661,201,324 francs for the army and 1,121,714,351 francs for the navy.

Great Britain's total debt to-day is £1,090,482,000, of which £920,490,000 is owing to the United States.

Mr. KING. Of course, that is an error. Great Britain's indebtedness is much greater.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall give the actual figures in a moment. I ascertained by examination that the figure just read was incorrect.

Yet for the coming year the British Army budget is £62,800,000 and naval expenses are estimated at £64,883,500.

Which the Senator will see is considerably less. While England is proposing to spend an enormous sum, yet it is considerably less than we propose to spend on our Navy.

Italy's total debt at the beginning of 1923 will be 122,000,000,000 lire gold, or an increase of 8,000,000,000 since the armistice, of which 8,250,000,000 represent American claims. Premier Mussolini promises army reforms, but without cutting expenses greatly.

He seems to have the same habit that some of those in charge of our Government have of promising to cut down the appropriations, but keeping them quite as large or larger than before.

As a result, the army budget stands at 1,975,000,000 lire and the naval budget 1,405,000,000.

While I am on my feet I desire to correct the amount of Great Britain's debt. Instead of being £1,090,000,000, as stated in the article, the total debt on December 2 was £7,902,000,000, of which about $4,000,000,000 is due the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. While the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was directing our attention to the article which appeared in the Washington Post this morning, it occurred to me that it was quite remarkable that this startling statement should be printed here in our daily papers in the Capital of the United States, just at the time the naval appropriation bill is pending, when an effort is being made to increase the appropriation above that carried in the last bill. Some of us are undertaking to bring down the appropriations in keeping with the purpose we had when we had the disarmament conference in the city of Washington.

It used to be said that there was a committee of propaganda working around the world for the purpose of building big navies in the various countries; that they would come to the United States and show quietly to those in authority that England was about to build two more battleships, France was going to build two more, Germany was going to build two more, and Japan was going to build two more. "Don't you think you had better build two more?" Then the moment we contracted to build two more they would go back around the same circle telling the other powers that we had just made our plans for building two more big dreadnaughts. Thus the propaganda went on and on. It looks to me like the present program is a part of that propaganda. The statement to-day that those countries are expending large amounts of money for the purpose of building battleships and enlarging their armies is evidently put forth for the purpose of affecting legislation in this Chamber. I wonder if it is being used for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to say that if nations like France, Great Britain, and Italy were able to expend these enormous sums for their armies and navies in these times of profound peace certainly they ought to pay the interest on the obligations they owe us. I say it is to Great Britain's credit that she has already started to pay the interest. I believe from what I know of her history, and especially her desire always to meet her obligations, that she will continue to pay the interest on her debt, as she contracted to do. I hope when her representatives come here—they are now on the way over—that they will not ask alms at our hands but will come prepared to meet their obligations in the same good faith in which those obligations were contracted for their benefit. I believe they will do that. I believe that France and Italy will follow Great Britain's example. I hope that our representatives on the commission, though they are Republicans, will see to it that America does not yield, but will require these nations, who are able to spend such enormous amounts for land and naval armament, to pay the interest which they owe us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word further in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. I stated a moment ago that under the terms of the treaty we were permitted to have a certain number of capital ships; that under the plan which had provided for 86,000 men 52,000 of enlisted men were regarded as necessary for sea duty. The difference between the 52,000 and the 86,000 represents practically the land forces; that is to say, those who will be upon the land are engaged upon activities that might be denominated land activities in contradistinction to sea service. I repeat that such a great proportion—the proportion of 52 to 86—is not to be justified; 52,000 men for sea service and the difference between 52,000 and 86,000 for land service can not be justified.

In addition to that the bill carries appropriations for tens of millions of dollars for employees, civilians, nontechnical men. I think it would be absolutely impossible for any person to go through the bill and determine the number of employees. I venture the assertion that the number will run into thousands and tens of thousands. In order to get 52,000 men at sea we are spending $325,000,000 to $330,000,000; and that is not all, as I have indicated, because demands will be made shortly for further appropriations.

Mr. President, we have been promised great reforms in the Navy Department following the war. Of course, during the war we looked for more or less of confusion and extravagance in both the War and the Navy Departments. It could not be otherwise. The demands were so great, the hasty mobilization upon land and sea so vigorous, that those things were prolific of extravagance and of waste. But we were led to believe that there would be very great reductions in the personnel and very great reductions in the overhead in the Navy Department following the war.

I have gone very carefully through the pending bill and compared it with the bill which we passed a year ago, and the pending bill carries a larger appropriation and makes, I venture to say, provision for more employees than the bill which we passed a year ago.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, does the Senator say it carries a larger appropriation?

Mr. KING. Yes; in the aggregate that is a larger direct appropriation, the amount being over $325,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is mistaken about that. It carries more than $18,000,000 less than the bill for the current year.

Mr. KING. The appropriation bill last year, as shown by the committee report, carried less than $300,000,000. It was frequently stated by the Senator and others during the debate, as I recall——

Mr. POINDEXTER. This bill carries less than $300 000,000.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon; my understanding is that it carries more than that, the amount exceeding $325,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that. Let us be frank and accurate in our statements. The pending bill appropriates less than $300,000,000, but it authorizes the transfer of certain funds so as to make those funds available for the increase of the Navy, which, added to the direct appropriations, makes, to give the Senator the exact figures, a total of $325,671,612. The Senator is comparing the appropriations carried by the pending bill with those carried by the bill for the current year, and he is adding to this year's bill the indirect appropriations. Does not the Senator think that, in the interest of fairness and accuracy of statement, he ought also to add to the bill for the current year the indirect appropriations which were authorized just as he adds to the pending bill similar indirect appropriations?

Mr. KING. If that is a question, I answer yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When that is done, then the sum total of the appropriations in the naval bill for the current year is found to be $343,857,073.25, which, instead of being less than the appropriations carried in the pending bill, is $18,185,000 more.

Mr. KING. If there were indirect appropriations in the bill for the current year they would be in addition, I have no doubt, to the two hundred and ninety-odd million dollars which were carried by the bill which we passed in the spring of this year. My understanding is that the larger part of those indirect appropriations were not expended, and were either covered back into the Treasury or are held as unexpended balances; so that, as a matter of fact, there has been expended up to the present time considerably less than the $300,000,000, or, rather, at the end of the fiscal year, to be perfectly fair, the direct appropriations plus the authorizations will be less than the two combined.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought the Senator was talking about appropriations and authorizations instead of expenditures. If he compares the expenditures of the current year, how is he going to compare them with the expenditures for next year? How can the Senator tell what portion of the funds to be appropriated now for the fiscal year 1924 will be expended at the end of the fiscal year 1924, which will be one year from the 1st of next July?

Mr. KING. I concede, Mr. President, that the fair way of comparing the appropriation bill of last year with the pending one is to take the direct appropriations and then take the authorizations and determine what part of the authorizations be employed. I think the Senator is in error in averring that the $35,000,000 is an authorization. I regard it the same as a direct appropriation from the Treasury. It must be so, because the revolving fund of $200,000,000, which, let me say in passing, ought not to exist but ought to be covered into the Treasury instead of appropriating, contains Federal funds and from these funds this sum by this bill is taken or authorized to be taken, and we know that it is the intention to at once transfer this sum from the present fund to construction account.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We can not cover that into the Treasury, because a large part of it consists of clothing and property of various kinds. I think there is only at the present time something over $9,000,000 of cash out of the fund of $200,000,000, the balance consisting of supplies.

Mr. KING. Well, Mr. President, if we have such a stupendous amount of supplies as the result of the war, or in part as the result of the war, it is clear they ought to have been disposed of long before this and the proceeds derived therefrom covered into the Treasury. Of course, whatever is required for the maintenance of an adequate quantity of supplies on hand should be reserved, but, aside from that, the balance ought to be converted into money and transferred to the Treasury of the United States. But, as I was stating, Mr. President, the $35,000,000 appropriation is a direct appropriation; it is not a mere authorization. I have no doubt there will be transferred from the revolving fund the $35,000,000, and it will be expended. Obviously it is intended that it shall be expended, for it goes to an account which contemplates its expenditure during the coming year. So the direct appropriation carried by this bill, I insist, will be the amount stated in the Senator's figures in his report of $295,604,378 plus the $35,000,000 which is to be taken from the revolving fund; and then, in addition to that, there is a certain amount, approximately $500,000, which will be derived from the sale of certain property. So I insist, Mr. President, that the appropriations for the next fiscal year are substantially the same and may exceed the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not want to be put in the position of admitting that by being silent. I simply wish to repeat what I have said several times already—that, instead of the appropriations carried by the pending bill being greater than those carried by the bill for the current year, they are more than $18,000,000 less.

Mr. KING. Of course, that can only be determined on the 30th of June of the coming year, when we may know what part of the authorized appropriations carried in the bill for the current year has been employed. If the forty-odd million dollars to which the Senator has referred have all been expended, then the Senator's statement is correct; otherwise, I respectfully submit, his position is not accurate.

Mr. President, I say again that, in my opinion, the Navy Department has not effected those economies that we were led to expect that it would; the expenses, if one will examine them, will be found to be so enormous as to excite the surprise and amazement not only of the superficial examiner but of those who make a careful scrutiny of the items of the bill.

Mr. GERRY obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me, in order that I may ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator from Utah is familiar with the bill, and I should like to ask him if he has considered the paragraph covering the appropriation for the Judge Advocate General's office. I find that the appropriations last year amounted to $35,810, for clerks, clerical aid, and so forth, including lawyers. I find on page 8 of the pending bill an appropriation of $78,720 for the same purposes.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that my understanding is, while there is a very large increase, a certain office—that of the solicitor of the Navy, or some branch of the Navy—has been abolished or, at least, consolidated with the Judge Advocate General's office, and it is contended that the expenses now of the Judge Advocate General's office comprise items which in the past were carried under two heads. As to whether or not the expenditures heretofore for both divisions exceeded or were less than the appropriations carried by the pending bill, I am not quite able to state.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I noticed the increase, and I thought probably the Senator could give some information about it.

Mr. KING. I may say that the expenditures last year for the Judge Advocate General's office were $29,810, and for temporary employees, $6,000, making $35,810 in all. In the pending bill the amount is much greater.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to make a statement in reply to the question of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GERRY. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The appropriation carried in this bill covering the two offices which have been consolidated is $3,720 less than the amount carried for the two offices for the current year. I may add also, although it is not essential, that there has been a great increase in the amount of work to be performed by the Judge Advocate General's office as compared to the amount of work that had to be performed by that office when the last appropriation was made. That arises from the fact that recent legislation has given the department jurisdiction to settle and determine claims in much larger amounts than the law previously authorized, and, consequently, there is an increase in the number of claims filed and increased work on that account. In addition to that, recent legislation authorized them to adjust claims of contractors. Where contracts have been interfered with by the end of the war or by war orders of the Government to the damage of contractors, they are required to make an investigation and report as to those matters, which was not required at the time the last appropriation was made.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, in the debate to-day there has been considerable discussion as to the number of men distributed among shore assignments. It has been stated that something over 30,000 men were employed on shore duty, and that that number is very disproportionate in comparison to the total strength of the personnel of the Navy. I think it is only fair in discussing this question to consider the character of assignments of these 30,000 men.

In the hearings before the House committee a table is found, on page 27, which shows that on September 30, 1922, the total actually assigned to shore duty was 28,735. I refer to that table because it gives actual figures and not estimates.

Take the item shore base submarine tenders—2,116 men. That looks, of course, on its face as if this was simply shore duty; but, as a matter of fact, the reason we have men at shore bases for submarines is because we have not enough mother ships. In war time they would go to sea with the submarine flotilla, and would now if we had the necessary mother ships. They are really part of the fleet.

Shore activities craft—district vessels—1,367 men. This covers the work done by the naval personnel in manning small vessels for the stations, including the seagoing tugs. I know that the men engaged in the latter activities, in my section of the country at least, are performing most excellent service. They give aid to vessels in distress. Hard work in rough seas.

Nearly 7,000 under training station recruits and trade schools. These are the men that are undergoing training for the active service.

Then another figure: I have taken only a few at random to show that this total number of over 28,000 men that are supposed to be doing shore duty in reality, when we study the items, are part of the fleets.

The item in transit, 1,528, refers to those men who are being transferred from one ship to the other. They are simply going from one fleet to another.

Another item refers to patients in hospitals, 1,841, and prisoners, 760, making a total of 2,501 men. That can hardly be charged as an extravagance in naval expenditure or increasing unduly Navy personnel ashore.

If we add up the above totals, we find that out of this twenty-eight thousand-odd nearly 12,000 are employed in duties that really should not be classified as anything but part of the fleet activities; and that means that, deducting the twelve thousand and odd from the twenty-eight thousand and odd, we find that we have between sixteen and seventeen thousand men classed in shore duty that are actually a part of the fleet.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I called attention a moment ago to the article which appears in the Washington Post this morning, the headlines of which were read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]:

Huge sums for arms to be spent by Europe. England, France, and Italy preparing huge armament outlay in 1923.

Mr. President, this article suggests several thoughts. One is that this is a part of a propaganda that has been going on in the world for quite a number of years. People who make money out of manufacturing war implements, the building of battleships, submarines, and other things used in war are interested in keeping that work going on everywhere. One of the greatest forces against the League of Nations in the United States came from those who make money out of war and preparations for war. They used to go from country to country, as I suggested a moment ago, with their propaganda. They would go to Great Britain and tell Great Britain that the United States was building two mighty battleships. Then they would go to France and tell France the same thing. They would go to Japan and to Italy, and each naval power felt that it was necessary when they found that this great Government was spending a good deal of money in building up its Navy for them to get in the game. Immediately these countries would order the building of two battleships. Then these propagandists would come back to us, and they kept the trail hot from one country to the other, whispering around in secretive and insinuating ways that something was brewing in the world and that America must not be caught napping; that we had better build a tremendous navy also.

Mr. President, during the World War we built up a big Navy, and we now have a Navy second only to that of Great Britain, and she has the greatest navy in all the world. Growing out of the universal desire for peace and disarmament a conference was called in this city. England was represented in that conference. France was represented in that conference. Several of the powers were keenly interested in the outcome of that conference. This Government was a party to it; Japan was a party to it; and the paper this morning tells us that two of the great powers represented in that conference in the city of Washington are laying out stupendous sums to be spent for naval purposes and for armament purposes generally.

Mr. President, that suggests to my mind a situation that should have the serious consideration of Congress. If Great Britain and France here in this city but a little while ago, sitting with us at the council table and agreeing to cut down their armaments, are now going on in spite of that agreement and are expending stupendous sums, as this article says, to build up navies and land armaments, it would suggest to us that they are not keeping faith with the agreement written in the four-power pact.

One of the things that would be accomplished by the economic conference suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his amendment to this bill would be an inquiry into this sort of thing. Suppose we could have that economic conference, and we could have Great Britain and France in that conference, and others who knew whether an effort was really being made in good faith to get away from war, to prevent war in the future, or whether these people were camouflaging and deceiving us, and were saying that they were trying to prevent war and at the same time going on preparing and getting ready for another war. That is one of the things that would come out of this conference. That is one of the good ends that would be accomplished.

Another thought in that connection, Mr. President: As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has said, if these countries are expending these huge sums, that is notice to us that they are able to pay us what they owe us. If they came here to Washington and told this country that they were going back home to cut down their appropriations for naval purposes and for land armament, and they are not doing that, but are turning around and are increasing their appropriations for that purpose, then they have deceived us. We ought to know the facts, and this economic conference that has been suggested would give us that information. We would know then, from all over the world, just what was going on along this line.

Prior to the time of the presentation of the amendment by the Senator from Idaho we could not find out what was going on here. I never knew, nobody here that I knew anything about had ever heard, that an effort was being made by the President or by anybody else to find out exactly the conditions in the Old World and to let it be known that this Nation was ready to cooperate in a friendly way toward bringing about a better condition in the world. My own opinion is that very little has been done along that line. I think one good thing accomplished by the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho was to start something in that direction.

We could not get any news from the White House—that is, we did not. I feel that if the President was throwing out any feelers he should have notified the American people. That is something in which we are all interested. He should have notified the Congress that he was doing all in his power along that line.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator does not think he ought to have notified us before he found out himself that he was doing it; does he?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, that would be quite difficult to do. He would have to find out himself, so I am just coming to that thought. It seems to me that we were enabled by the fight we made to get some statement from the administration as to what was going on, and I think good has been accomplished in that regard. The Senator from Idaho flushed the leaders on his side like a covey of birds with that amendment of his. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] confessed that he took the leaders by great surprise over there by the course he had pursued, and I remarked that the Senator probably had committed the unpardonable Republican sin because he had dared to offer that amendment without consulting the distinguished leaders on the other side.

Mr. President, the Senate and the country did not know what was going on, did not know that anything was going on, looking toward bringing about a conference of the nations of the earth; and somehow or other I can not help but believe that nothing in that direction of a serious nature was going on until we started it up here.

The opinion is general in the country that the Disarmament Conference that was held was forced by the action that we took here. The Senator from Idaho led in that suggestion, and the Democratic side backed him up in it. But for the support that he got on this side of the Chamber that resolution never would have passed. Now, it seems that the offering of this amendment to the naval bill has borne good fruit already.

The first day we discussed that amendment in this Chamber we did not get any assurance from the White House as to what was going on or would be done. We got a note from the White House suggesting that this thing ought not to be done, and telling the Senate to "lay off" of it. That is the spirit and the temper we found in the White House the first day this matter was discussed in the Senate. But when it dawned on those in authority that we were likely to adopt that amendment, that favorable action was going to be had upon the amendment, there was quite a different tone on the other side on yesterday. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who is always armed and equipped with information necessary to take care of a Republican crisis in this Chamber, was here with assurances that we are going to put out feelers, feel around in Europe to see whether or not an economic conference would be agreeable to those nations. The Senator from Idaho straightway rose and asked him if the Senator spoke authoritatively when he said that such was being done. He said, no; he was not speaking with authority, but he did know what was going on in that direction, and he stated on his own responsibility that such an effort was being made. Then the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] rose and assured the Senator from Idaho that steps were being taken, that feelers were being put out, that conversation was being had around in the Old World to find out whether those people would be agreeable to a conference of this kind.

Then the Senator from Idaho said, "What are you doing?" "Well, we are asking them if there is anything we can do toward helping them readjust matters and toward aiding them in improving conditions." Those are just about the words he used, and those are the words I used, and the Senator from Idaho and others said the purpose of an economic conference was to see if there was anything we, a great peace-loving Nation, could do toward aiding them, not toward canceling this public debt due us by the Allies, but what, in an economic way, is necessary to be done to bring about a better condition of things, to improve the prospects of peace in the world. The Senator from Idaho said:

> If the Senator from Massachusetts, speaking for the administration, as he does, gives us that assurance I am ready to withdraw my amendment.

I repeat, up to that time we had had no communication from the White House as to what was going on; but listen to what the Post said this morning:

> That the United States Government is making efforts to bring about such a conference was made known at the White House yesterday. Secretary Hughes, in an address at the annual meeting of the American Historical Association at New Haven last evening, outlined some of the features of the American plan.

Mr. President, if we have accomplished that much, we ought to be commended for what we have done. We want action along this line. We want to wake up the powers that be. We want them to know that the Senate is interested and that the people of this country are interested in having something done and in keeping on doing something until something of good and of value is accomplished.

We have seen the utter failure of the four-power pact. We have seen the failure of our ambassador to Great Britain, and he is coming back now, the Senator from Indiana told us. He said. "What is he coming home for now except to bring information regarding conditions in which we are interested?"

I had hoped he was coming home to stay. If I were President there would not be any doubt about that. His services would terminate immediately upon his arrival. I believe it was Mr. Hearst who not long ago stated, in a signed article, I have been told, that Mr. Harvey was recommended for ambassador by certain international bankers, and that he was appointed because of that influence. That is a pretty serious charge. He may be coming over here to bring some information regarding the scheme of the international bankers. There are certain international bankers who want to cancel the debt due this Government by the foreign powers. Certain international bankers in the United States have owing to them about $4,000,000,000 by foreign countries, and they do not want the debt due to our Government to interfere with the collection of their private debts, and they are undertaking to manipulate and so handle the debt due this Government that they can collect the four billions owed to them.

Mr. President, these international bankers do not want this foreign debt paid to our Government. They do not intend to have it paid. They are going to exert tremendous influence to have that debt canceled. I am going to continue to insist that the people of the United States have representation on that debt commission. They are not represented there now. The Republican Party alone is represented on that commission. There are five partisan Republicans on the commission and no Democrat, no Progressive, no anybody else except partisan Republicans. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has offered a resolution providing for Democratic representation on the commission, to which I called attention yesterday and the day before, and I am going to keep on calling attention to it until the Senate and the other House recognizes the Democratic Party, which represents millions of American people, and until we have representation on that debt commission. Senators on the other side might just as well get it into their minds that we are going to have representation on that debt commission or they will never hear the last of it. What right have they to appoint five partisan Republicans to sit in judgment upon a thing involving $12,000,000,000 owing to the American people?

I will wait until the conversation closes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it is time to say there was no conversation going on on this side when the Senator said he would wait. There are more Republican Senators present than there are Democratic Senators. If the Senator wants to make his speech, he ought to go on and do it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Several Senators are at lunch. The Senator from Kansas was not talking at that time, but he was engaging in a whispered conversation just before that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Usually there are not enough on the other side to carry on a conversation.

Mr. CURTIS. We can get them if we want them.

Mr. CARAWAY. You can get them. You have them staked out, and you can bring them in, but they are never here.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, there are not enough over there to carry on a very vigorous conversation, and there will not be enough over there to carry on any kind of a conversation after the next election, and that will be a Godsend to the country. [Laughter.] I know what I am saying may not be very pleasant to some of the Senators on the other side, but they are going to hear a good deal about this thing until this wrong has been righted.

The Republican Party has no right to appoint five partisan Republicans to handle a debt of $12,000,000,000 owed to the American people. That high-handed act may breed and bring forth a public scandal. There is something wrong about it and there is something rotten in it. It can not be defended in any tribunal of justice in the world. What right has any party to take an indebtedness due to the people of the United States and parcel it out for consideration to a few partisans of that party? They have not that right, and we are not going to remain silent and permit this thing to stand. I am going to fight for that change until I get it. We are going to keep up the fight until the people have been recognized and both parties are represented upon that debt commission.

This is a big question and concerns the whole people. Twelve billions of dollars belonging to the people of the United States is no small concern. It was whispered around this Capitol for weeks and months that the Republican purpose was to cancel this foreign debt. We know that the propaganda was so thick around this Capitol you could almost cut it with a knife; but we Democrats fought here, and fought on and on, until we frightened the other side, so that just before the election one or two of them came out and said they, too, favored the collection of the debt. The Republican leaders have not favored it until driven to it by the Democrats, and when a man is driven to a position like that he is not very deeply concerned about whether it succeeds or not. He may be compelled to take the stand because of the political exigencies of the hour, but $12,000,000,000 owed to the American people shall not be handled by five partisans of any party if I can help it. I would condemn it if it were being done by the Democrats.

Senators, it is not right; it is unfair, unjust, and wrong. I repeat it can not be defended by anybody anywhere.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has offered a resolution providing that three Democrats shall be appointed by the President upon that commission. If we adopt his resolution we would then have eight—five Republicans and three Democrats—on the debt commission, and that would be fair and just to all. Why not have that? Who on the other side, authorized to speak for the Republican Party, will tell me to-day that they will agree to the passage of the Harris resolution which provides for the appointment of three Democrats on this debt commission?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I would like to state, in justice to the chairman of the Finance Committee, who has been absent from the city, that he informed me that he would call a committee meeting very soon to consider the resolution I offered and which the Senator is discussing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that. They have waited a long time about considering it. I want them to consider it as soon as possible. It is of the highest importance to the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator wants them to do is to consider it in the right way.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. I want them to consider it in the right way, to report it favorably, of course, and if it is not reported out soon I will ask the Senator from Georgia to request its consideration by the Senate.

I repeat, $12,000,000,000 indebtedness is owed to this people, 80,000,000 of whom are debt ridden and tax burdened to-day. Farmers all over the West and all over the South are having their farms sold for taxes. Senators, these people are in a deplorable condition in this country, and here is a debt of $12,000,000,000 due to our people, and it is being mysteriously handled by a commission of political partisans. If we could collect a part of that debt it would lift the tax burden from their backs and hasten the day when prosperity and happiness would come back to them. But a commission of five Republican partisans are handling it, and I do not know what they are doing, but I am entitled to know what they are doing. I am a representative of a sovereign State in this body and a United States Senator interested in justice and fair dealing to all the people, and I speak for them when I say that we are entitled to know what that commission is doing, but the truth is we do not know. Nobody knows, I take it, except a few partisan Republicans and international bankers.

When the President of the United States agreed to the commission of five Republicans he committed a serious blunder and did a great wrong himself. When the leaders of his party in this Chamber and the other branch of Congress approved of that arrangement they perpetrated a grievous wrong and outrage against the proprieties of decency and fair dealing. I want them to hasten to right that wrong. It ought to be done. There is no fair-minded Republican in the country, man or woman, who, if the proposition was stated to them, would not say, "Yes; there should be Democrats on that commission—both parties should be represented upon it." Why were no Democrats put upon it? Somebody knows. There was a reason for it. I think that the purpose of debt cancellation was at the bottom of it. I think they intended quietly to manipulate it toward debt cancellation, carry on a propaganda, keep all the doings of the commission behind closed doors in partisan circles, and after a while force some plan upon the people when it would be difficult to prevent it. I fear something like that was back of it.

Mr. President, in order to allay suspicion, in order to clear up the whole thing, in order that the American public may know all about it and feel satisfied about it, let us put three Democrats on the commission. Then we would have a commission composed of representatives of the two great parties that speak for the American people. Let them suggest their negotiations, and one side or the other of those parties would let the public know and nothing harmful would be done without the people being apprised of it. I submit again in this free Government, or what is left of it, that we are entitled to have both parties represented on that very important debt commission.

I call upon the leader on the other side, I call upon the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] now to say if he is not willing that the Democrats shall have representation upon that commission, which is to handle this great debt due to the American people. I yield to the Senator from Kansas if he wants to answer that question.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not asked the Senator to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas does not want to answer the question. There is no answer to it except to say that it is fair and right and just for Democrats to be upon the commission. I am surprised that the Senator from Kansas, who is usually pretty frank about these things, does not get up and say that personally he would be willing for the Democratic people of America to have representation upon that debt commission.

Who bought the Liberty bonds? Democratic men and Democratic women the country over. Their money has gone into this indebtedness of $12,000,000,000 just as has Republican money. And yet this great army of Democratic men and women in the country are not represented, and the Senator from Kansas, the whip on the Republican side of the Chamber, declines to state that he believes they are entitled to representation upon that important commission. The Senator from Kansas declines to say either that he favors Democrats being on it or that he is opposed to them being on it. Well, Mr. President, the attitude of the Senator from Kansas is probably the attitude of his party. He is just about as audible on the subject as they have been and the answer that we get from the Senator from Kansas is grim and stubborn silence.

Mr. President, I submit that when the war was on and President Wilson, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, called for these dollar-a-year men, they came, but how they did impose upon him. Some of the most partisan Republicans that ever breathed the breath of life came here offering their good offices and got into the Government and directed trade to the concerns which they represented at home and sold the Government their own manufactured material at magnificent figures. They made money out of the Government hand over fist. The President put aside every idea of partisan politics. He said, "It is an American war, and all the people are interested in it. To America the world is looking for deliverance, and I am calling Americans to the standard, boys to the battle front, men and women at home, for unity of purpose and concert of action."

That is what President Wilson summoned us to do. We did it and won the war. Then when it was over we found that our allies had borrowed from us $10,000,000,000, and the interest now accumulated amounts to $2,000,000,000, making $12,000,000,000 in all. A new administration came in and proceeded to name a debt commission to handle the debt due the whole American people, and who did they put upon it? Men representing all the mass of the people? Oh, no! They made it a partisan commission of five, headed by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is said that he is exceedingly friendly with and interested in certain international bankers. I do not know whether that is true or not. He is on the commission with four other partisan Republicans.

What about the Democratic people of the country? They were patriotic. You Democrats, you poor woman whose son bared his breast to the enemy on the fields of France, you stinted yourself and bought Liberty bonds. The money which you gave to the Government in this way is involved in this debt, but you are not represented on the commission which is going to handle it. You do not know whether it is intended to collect the debt or to cancel it. You do not know what the commission is doing with it. You do not know whether they are going to postpone payment of it over a stretch of years reaching away yonder into the future, with an interest rate so small and infinitesimal that it will not amount to anything. You simply are not represented. Your boy represented you on the battle front. You spoke for your fireside with your funds. But the Republican Party has denied you representation upon the commission that is to handle that debt and say what shall be done with it.

You Democratic men who went out and made arrangements to buy Liberty bonds when you were not able to buy them—your substance is represented in that debt, but you are not represented upon the commission. Why not? Did you not do your duty in the war? Oh, yes. Did not this woman do her duty? Oh, yes. Your sons were on the battle front? Yes. Why, then, is such treatment accorded you? Because it is so ordered through this miserable policy of the Republican Party; that is why. Can it be defended? No; it is inexcusable and indefensible. It smells to high heaven with crooked doings and rank suspicion. I repeat, there is something wrong about it and something rotten in it. I may just as well talk plainly about it. The Republicans have no right to take a $12,000,000,000 indebtedness because they happen to be intrusted temporarily with control of the Government and to secretly handle it behind closed doors, with nobody but Republican partisans sitting at the council table. They have no right to do it, and they are not going to continue to do it without solemn protest from me. We are going to have action upon that subject, or we will not have speedy action upon many other things at this session of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I ask the distinguished Senator from Alabama if the party which was in power before the Republican Party came into power in 1920 had looked industriously after the interests of the people of the country, would they have loaned all this money to the European nations without any security? The party which failed to do its duty to the people was the party which loaned the people's money without any security.

Mr. HEFLIN. As usual, the Republican mind emphasizes money rather than men. The Senator from Colorado, and a very clever gentleman he is, seems to have been willing for us to send our boys over there without any guaranty of their return and to let them pour their blood out on the battle field and die without any assurance that they were coming back, but he would have us take security for our money right in the high tide of battle, when the liberty of the world was at stake. He would have had us stop and figure over securing a dollar when we were spending our boys by the thousands on the battle line. That is in keeping with the doctrine of the average Republican in office. He would have had us use more boys and more bullets and fewer dollars.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I did not say so at all. What I said was that if the Democrats who were in control of the affairs of the Government at that time had used business sense, had even used horse sense, we would not find ourselves in the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. We find $10,000,000,000 loaned to Europe without $1 of security. We are told that they do not even carry those loans as a liability when taking account of their liabilities.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me just a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield with pleasure to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Colorado, my good friend, I believe was not in the Senate at the time the loans were made. If he had been he would have done just what all the Republicans did. Every one of them voted for the loans to be made in just that way. Those loans were made by Congress, I believe, with absolute unanimity. The Republicans voted for them just as the Democrats did.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now my good friend from Colorado finds that the Republican horse sense on his side of the Chamber voted, as did the Democrats, to make these loans. We were in the midst of a terrible war, and we had to render financial aid to our allies in the form of loans.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I want to reply to my friend from Tennessee. Is it not a fact that a Democratic Congress conferred the power upon President Wilson to make those loans? Is it not a further fact that after the armistice was signed he loaned $1,500,000,000 more of the people's money to European nations without security?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was all done with the approval of Republicans as well as Democrats. It was done under an act of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLSON. It was done with the approval of President Wilson.

Mr. HEFLIN. My friend from Colorado has waded right in and he is now very cleverly wading out again. The Senator from Colorado, very clever Senator that he is, condemns the Democrats and innocently the Republicans, too, for loaning money to the European powers, our allies, in time of war when the money was to be used to purchase ammunition to use on the battle front to help our boys whip the enemy, but it develops now that the Senator's own party voted and approved of every step taken in loaning the money to the Allies.

Mr. President, many things were done under the necessity of war that would not be done in time of peace. At that time the whole world was looking anxiously to the battle front in France and hoping and praying that we might speedily end that terrible war in victory. That was what was going on. And when the allied nations called on us for money we loaned them that money. We did right in loaning it to them. We were sending over there our boys, the most precious treasure in the household of America, and if we were sending them there to die by the thousand, why not loan money to help win the war? The question I am now discussing, however, is in the collection of the money due us, and we want both parties represented on the debt commission, so that all the people will be represented and the country may know what steps are being taken in the direction of collecting the money owed to us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that when the money was loaned no member of the Republican Party, to which my good and delightful friend from Colorado belongs, offered any such amendment as that now suggested by him.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly not. The intentions of the Senator from Colorado were good, but he was innocent of information upon the subject.

Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Colorado believes that it is right and fair for the Democrats to have representation upon the Debt Funding Commission, and I am now going to ask him if he does not believe that it would be fair for three Democrats to be on that commission with the five Republicans?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I am very frank to state to the Senator from Alabama that I think the Democratic Party should have had representation on the commission.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I knew that the big, clever, western Senator felt that way in his heart. I now offer the opportunity again to my friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to say that he, too, is willing for the Democrats to be represented upon that commission. But silence is his answer. I will now ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if he does not believe that it is fair, and just, and right for the Democrats to be represented on the Debt Funding Commission? The Senator from Utah is a member of that commission, and I ask him if he does not think that the Democrats are entitled to representation upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is not going in any way, shape, or form to become a party to the filibuster that is on this afternoon.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, how innocent and meek the Senator appears. His answer to the proper and simple question that I propounded is one of the profoundest answers ever made in this Chamber. He is not going to be a party to a filibuster. That is just like asking a fellow if he is guilty or not guilty and he says, "I do not want to take any part in these proceedings." [Laughter.] If a man were to say that before a judge he would probably be sent to jail for contempt of court, but the Senator from Utah is on that Debt Funding Commission and he knows that they can do as Republican partisans please, and perhaps he does not want to be disturbed by the presence of Democrats. The able Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] said:

> I will be perfectly frank and say that I think the Democrats ought to be represented on that commission.

Who else on the other side believes that the Democrats of America should be represented on that commission? I pause for an interruption from any or all of them. What other Republican Senator believes that the Democratic people of America are entitled to be represented on that commission? [After a pause.] No one responds. Mr. President, I want to get their names, the names of those present, because I am going to be in their States in the next campaign, and I am going to confront them with the same question unless they give us representation on that debt commission.

This is the people's business. I am not saying anything I ought not to say. Free speech is guaranteed; open debate is vouchsafed in the Senate under the Constitution and the rules of the Senate, and I am going to avail myself of it.

> Work on bravely God's own daughters,
> Work on bravely God's own sons,
> But 'till ye have smoother waters
> Let truth fire her minute guns.

There is but one place where we can absolutely get the truth to the people, and that is in this Chamber and in the other. We can not talk to the people throughout the country except here; I mean we can not go out into the various States when Congress is in session and matters are pending here that vitally affect the people; but we can talk here upon those questions, and the people who come to this gallery on their tours to Washington can take back the message to their people at home that there are yet a few here who believe that this is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. I say that under the arrangement under which the Debt Funding Commission is operating it is not a government of the people; it is a government by partisan selfishness and chicanery. I believe in holding parties responsible to the people for the conduct of the government under their control, and we are going to hold the Republican Party responsible for both its conduct and misconduct.

Who studied out this debt-funding partisan plan? Who inspired it in the beginning? Who was it that did not want anybody but partisan Republicans upon the commission? Who was it that cried out against putting even one Democrat on it? What interest is back of this procedure? Who is it that is interested to such an extent that no Democrat is permitted to appear upon it to speak for the great body of the Democratic people in the United States? Senators, you are going to be confronted with these questions many times before you are through. I do not intend that you shall forget them.

Now, I desire to refer to another matter. I have spoken longer than I intended, but I want to say in all sincerity that I am not now engaged in a filibuster. The Senator from Utah excuses himself in the most feeble and lame fashion by saying that he is not going to participate in any way in what he calls a filibuster.

It would not take him more than a second to say whether he favors the Democrats having representation on the Debt Funding Commission or not. He could say "yes" or he could say "no," and it would not take him but a second or two to say that; but the Senator from Utah dodges and undertakes to evade the issue by saying that he does not want to participate in any filibuster. There is no filibuster here to-day, Mr. President, but it may be that there are those on the other side who do not like to hear me talk thus plainly for the rights of the American people. It has been here very much out of fashion under Republican rule to do that, but that kind of discussion is coming back into fashion and is going to become more fashionable as the session of the Senate waxes older.

Why can not the Senator from Utah tell the Senate and tell the country that he is in favor of our having representation upon that commission, or why can he not say, as his silence indicates, that he is opposed to our having representation upon that commission? Suppose I were to be asked if I believed in Jesus Christ, and I were to say, "I am not going to participate in the filibuster that is going on," what would every Christian in the country believe my position was on the subject? They would say, "He is an infidel; he does not believe in the doctrine of the Christian religion." But I do believe in it with all my heart, and I would avail myself of the opportunity of saying so if that question were put to me. I would not hide behind a subterfuge of any kind to avoid answering the question, but I would promptly answer "Yes." I have asked the Senator from Utah, himself a member of the Debt Funding Commission, appointed to handle this indebtedness of $12,000,000,000, "Do you believe that the Democrats should have representation on that commission?" and the Senator declines to answer, because, forsooth, he does not want to participate in a filibuster. I asked that question of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], and he said, "I will say frankly to the Senator from Alabama that I think the Democrats ought to have representation upon the commission." That is the way to talk right out in meeting. That is the honest American way of talking. I do not know where this mysterious opposition to having Democrats on the debt commission comes from, although it may come from the international bankers.

Mr. President, it is becoming fashionable with certain leaders on the other side to minimize big things in this Government and to simply pass them by, or to shove them out of the way, and let them go. Little by little and bit by bit the liberties of the American people are being encroached upon by the powerful and mysterious influences back of the party in power. What step fraught with more evil and danger could have been taken than the one to which I have called to your attention to-day?

The debt is due, I repeat, not to the leaders of the Republican Party, not to the campaign committee of the Republican Party, not to the Republican Party itself, but due to the whole American people. It amounts to $12,000,000,000, and yet when the time comes to devise ways and means for collecting it or for handling it and looking after it, none but partisan Republicans are appointed on that commission. When those commissioners meet and anything is discussed, I imagine it will be said, "Do not say anything about this; do not say anything about that now; do not let the Democrats get hold of that; we do not want this to get out; we want to keep all of this to ourselves until we get ready to tell it to the public"—when it will be too late, everlastingly too late, for the public to protect itself.

Secrecy! Why, they used to condemn the Democrats. They told us about what Wilson was doing, making this mistake and that, saying he did not take them into his confidence. Are they taking us into their confidence? Are they taking the mass of the American people into their confidence? Are the people being told about what is being done with this indebtedness? Suppose you, Mr. President, and I and eight others were interested together in a partnership and somebody owed us a million dollars, and five of us were Democrats and five were Republicans, and the five Republicans got off in a corner and said, "We have met and have named three of our number to look after the collection of this debt," and the five Democrats would say, "Well, we are interested in the matter; we want to know what is being done;" and the reply would be made, "We can not tell you yet because we have named three Republicans to look after it," and the Democrats would say, "We are Democrats; we are interested, too, and we have not been represented;" how long would you stand for that situation, Mr. President? I think you would go into court, as I would, and say, "I will not be treated in any such way." Yet the party which went into power in 1920 names a debt commission composed of five partisan Republicans.

Every one of them is a hide-bound, old-time, stand-pat Republican. They are Republicans, good and strong; but I am not objecting to that if you will put some Democrats on the commission. I have a right to demand that you do it.

Mr. President, I repeat I would not be willing for any party, not even my own party, to name a partisan commission of five men to handle an indebtedness of $12,000,000,000. I am trying to do the right thing and the fair thing. I am going to keep on insisting on it here; and if Senators on the other side want to progress with legislation, they can do it by putting three Democrats on this commission and bringing in here a farm credits bill that has teeth in it. Those two things you will have to do before the 4th of March, I serve notice on you now. There are several of us here who will work to that end. We are entitled to both. We are entitled to have three Democrats upon this commission. We are entitled to have a banking system that will give relief to the oppressed and ill-treated farmers of America.

Mr. President, I will say this in conclusion, and then let the Senate proceed with the consideration of the naval bill:

We want to collect this debt that is due us. We do not want any secret conclaves held behind closed doors regarding it. We are entitled to have this thing done in the open. The American people, whose Government this is, are entitled to know what is being done with this important matter which affects them so vitally.

What did President Wilson tell you in 1919? He said to the Senators:

> If the League of Nations is not accepted, or some international agreement entered into, you are going to find new troubles breaking out in the Old World. You are going to find agriculture depressed in this country. You are going to find your wheat farmers injuriously affected by it. You are going to find your cotton producers injuriously affected by it. You are going to find disturbance the world over as a result of your short-sighted policy.

Was he not a prophet? What he told you would occur has occurred. The Old World to-day, portions of it, are in a state of ferment, and war is actually in progress in some places. The farmers of the wheat-growing States have their farms mortgaged and their cattle mortgaged and their crops mortgaged and their lands advertised for sale for taxes. The farmers in the South have their land mortgaged, their cotton mortgaged, and their lands advertised for sale for taxes.

Oh, Mr. Wilson was a prophet. He told you what would happen, and the party responsible for all these ills now puts a debt commission on us of five partisan Republicans. Shame on the party that will insist that that thing stand! It stands as a scarlet letter of wrongdoing upon the brow of every Republican who voted for it, and the only way you can remove that scarlet letter is by voting to put three Democrats upon that debt commission. Then you will have done the fair and honest thing. Follow the example of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] and stand up before the Congress and your country and say, "Deep down in my heart I must confess that I believe that it is right and just that the Democrats should be represented on the $12,000,000,000 Debt Commission.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I did not know that my good friend, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], was going to discuss the merits of my bill to-day. When I introduced the bill providing for the appointment of three Democrats on the Debt Funding Commission, I stated that it was done to prevent partisan discussion of the more than eleven billion dollar debt owed to this country. Without any criticism on my part—his argument was unanswerable—I think the Senator's partisan speech to-day is the best reason that could be offered for the adoption of my measure. This debt is the greatest financial problem that the Congress of the United States will have to solve within the next century, probably; and every Senator knows that it can be solved in a nonpartisan way very much better than if it is done by a partisan commission.

I have heretofore stated that I had the utmost confidence in the members of the commission. I have no criticism of their ability or integrity, but it will be admitted by every Member of this body that there are Senators on this side of the Chamber equally as honest and able to discharge the duties required of this commission. I think you will all agree that Senator GLASS, who was Secretary of the Treasury under the last administration, is probably more familiar with this work than any Senator on either side of the Chamber. There are other Democratic Members of both the House and Senate who would reflect credit on themselves and our Government in the discharge of their duties on this commission.

As the Senator from Alabama says, the money we loaned the European countries, our allies during the war, was raised by selling bonds to loyal citizens; even widows and soldiers fighting at the front denied themseves to buy these bonds to conduct the war. It was a nonpartisan war, and I think it is going to be difficult to collect this debt and we can certainly solve it better if we prevent any excuse for partisan discussion.

As I stated, I think it is the most difficult financial problem we shall have to solve, and I think we ought to get away from politics in the solution of it. The Congress that finally settles the matter may have a majority of Democrats in both Houses. It is going to hurt this country if the question of politics must enter into every suggestion that is brought here by the debt funding commission. My bill was introduced with the hope of avoiding any partisanship. I have discussed it with Members on both sides of the Chamber and I am glad to say that Senators on the other side of the Chamber with whom I have discussed it have told me that it met with their approval.

If I viewed this from a partisan standpoint I would prefer a Republican commission, but this is too important to let politics influence us. My bill provides that the President shall make the appointment. I have already discussed the matter with Chairman MCCUMBER and other members of the Finance Committee and have been assured of an early meeting of the committee to consider the matter.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I suppose now my amendment will be voted upon. I ask for a rising vote on the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the Chair have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 30, line 8, it is proposed to insert:

> Provided further, That the enlisted forces of the Navy shall not exceed 67,000 men.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on page 47, at the end of line 15, I move to add the following proviso as an amendment:

> Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available for the pay of more than 17,500 enlisted men of the Marine Corps during the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. President, Senators are desirous of disposing of this bill at the earliest possible moment so that an adjournment may be taken until after the New Year. There are a number of provisions which I should like to discuss with a view to modifying some of the provisions of this bill and reducing some of the items of appropriation. I appreciate the futility of any discussion or any effort to reduce the amount carried in this bill. Senators seem to be obsessed with the idea that we must make larger appropriations for both the Navy and the Army than were ever made in the history of this Republic except during the Civil War and the World War. The Army and Navy bills for 1924 will carry more than six hundred million dollars. This sum is so stupendous that the American people will be amazed and they will wonder what situation demands the laying of such a heavy burden upon their backs. We have been told that no reductions can be made in the general appropriations for other branches of the Government. Indeed, the requirements for vocational education and to meet what is conceded to be proper for those who are suffering from disabilities resulting from their military and naval service will probably be greater than for the current year. It was felt by many, and certainly that view was entertained by the American people, that the demands made by the Navy Department and the War Department would be very much less for the next fiscal year than for the present year. The amendment which I have offered deals with the Marine Corps. Several years ago a certain ratio was established between the number of enlisted men to be maintained in the Marine Corps and those who were to be found in the Navy. Whether that ratio was founded upon any valid reason may be questioned. At any rate the ratio was maintained. Now the purpose is to disregard such ratio and to give to the Marine Corps a greater number of officers and men than would be justified if such ratio was to be followed. Perhaps no organization within the Government has been more successful in presenting its claims for proper recognition and for appropriations than the Marine Corps.

It has been most successful in its efforts to obtain appropriations and secure the favor of Congress. I am making no complaint. Indeed, I rather admire the efficient manner in which it and its friends have proceeded to accomplish the purposes of those connected with the Marine Corps. I do not derogate in any manner from the honor and glory to which this splendid organization is entitled. Some of the most gallant officers to be found in any country have important places in the Marine Corps. Perhaps there is no more efficient fighting force in the world than the Marine Corps of the United States. The marines, whether they are serving upon land or upon sea, have brought honor to their organization and glory to this Republic. Mr. President, I speak with a deep feeling of appreciation for the heroic work performed by the marines of our country. But while appraising them for their valorous deeds and paying tribute to their splendid organization we should not be indifferent to other considerations inseparably connected with the welfare and vital interests of the Republic. I think the effort to militarize this Republic is very strong at the present time. Naval officers and military commanders are active in their efforts to impress upon the people the importance of strengthening our Army and building up a mighty Navy. There is a determined effort to prevent any reduction in the personnel of the Marine Corps, and this bill provides for a number greatly in excess of that found prior to the war. In my opinion the force is too large and should be reduced to ten or twelve thousand. My motion, however, calls for 17,500 enlisted men of the Marine Corps. It seems to me that Senators should support the motion notwithstanding their desire to maintain a strong organization. As I have hastily figured it, if my motion were adopted it would approximate the ratio which I have referred to and which existed for a number of years between the number of the Marine Corps and the number of enlisted men in the Navy.

Mr. President, there are only two countries in the world who provide for marines upon battleships. Great Britain, because of her vast colonial possessions, was compelled to have a marine force with most of her battleships. The outbreaks and revolutionary movements occurring from time to time in her many ports called for a considerable number of her marines upon her fighting craft. The United States followed the example of Great Britain in placing marines upon capital ships. However, the reason which called for England's policy does not exist so far as the United States is concerned. Naval officers have told me that it was a mistake to attach marines to fighting ships. I have not time to present the reasons given or to argue the wisdom or lack of wisdom of this policy. I should add, however, that our Government has been making excursions into policies which many denominate imperialistic and which has called for the employment of marines upon foreign shores. We are unwisely keeping marines in Haiti and Santo Domingo and in one of the Central American Republics. There are now perhaps 3,500 or 4,000 marines in the Dominican Republic and in the Haitian Republic. We have no business in either of those countries. Mr. President, if time permitted I would like to present to the Senate figures showing the cost of maintaining the Marine Corps, the number and grade of its officers, the increase in the number of personnel since the organization of the corps, and generally such facts as in my judgment called for a material reduction in this force. However, as stated, the anxiety of Senators to adjourn leads me to forbear from entering upon a discussion upon these matters. I will therefore ask for a vote upon my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on page 47, at the end of line 15, I move to add the following provso:

Provided, That no part of said amount shall be used for the purpose of maintaining or employing marines, either officers or enlisted men, in the Republic of Haiti or the Dominican Republic after June 30, 1923.

This subject deserves full discussion at the hands of the Senate, but I shall not now do more than to offer a few words in support of my amendment. Mr. President, whatever causes existed justifying the military and naval occupation of the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti, it can not be claimed that they now exist. In my opinion, we are not justified in occupying either of those countries. It is almost impossible to determine what the costs are to the American people resulting from these imperialistic policies which find expression in the occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo. We have kept in those two countries for a number of years several thousand marines at a cost of millions and tens of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of the United States. I am glad to know that the administration has announced its purpose to withdraw in the near future from the Republic of Santo Domingo. The people of that country were aggrieved at the course pursued by the United States. They did not invite our Nation to take possession of their Government and to maintain by force the control of their territory. The course of our Nation was condemned by the Latin-American people, who viewed with alarm what they regarded as a policy of territorial conquest upon the part of this Republic. The people of Santo Domingo protested in a most vigorous way against the occupation of their territory. They let their disapproval be known, particularly to the Latin-American people. They protested to our own Government and sent delegations to the United States demanding that the military and naval forces of this Government be withdrawn.

I repeat, Mr. President, we have no right to take possession of this country or to superimpose upon them a government which to them was hateful, as it would have been to the American people themselves. A military or a naval government, no matter how generous or considerate those in control may seek to be, is oppressive. It can not be otherwise, and when a powerful nation such as the United States sends its warships and its marine forces to a weak country and at the mouths of its guns takes possession of their country and their government, the anger, indignation, and fear of such people inevitably will be aroused. And it is not a sufficient answer to say that our Government seeks the welfare of the people.

The people of Santo Domingo have the right to determine their own form of Government and lay their own taxes and to expend them as they may see fit. We may give a better government to the people of Haiti than they can devise themselves, but our Government is not their Government, and, no matter how wise or benevolent or progressive or just and generous the conduct of our Government may be in dealing with the Haitian people or the people of the Republic of Santo Domingo, resentments will be aroused and opposition and hatred developed. Mr. President, I inquired at the State Department this morning as to when our Government would withdraw its forces from Haitian territory. I was advised that no plans had been developed looking to the withdrawal of our military or naval forces. Mr. President, in my opinion we are not justified in keeping our war vessels in Haitian waters or our marines upon Haitian territory. The people of that country are opposed to our intervention and to our occupation of their lands. The Government of Haiti is not their Government—it is our Government. We are in control of the country. Our marines are there. Our war vessels occupy their harbors. The Haitian people feel that we are there because of our strength and power, not because we have the moral right to be there. We control their fiscal policies. If we do not levy their taxes, we determine what the internal and police policy of the Government shall be. Our occupation of Haiti has caused the lives of between two and three thousand Haitian people. They believe that we were their oppressors and that we sought to take from them their country. I do not mean that all of the Haitian people regretted our occupation, but I am persuaded that the great majority of the Haitian people resented and still resent the course of the United States in forcibly taking possession of Haiti.

Mr. President, we may try to sugar coat our occupation by fine phrases, but the fact is that it is a military occupation. We govern that country by force and we impose upon them our will, or at least the will of those whom we sent there. It will be claimed that we are there pursuant to a treaty. Mr. President, I have not the time to discuss that contention, but will only remark that the treaty, so called, was a mockery. It did not represent the national will—the will of the Haitian people—and it does no credit to the United States to justify its position and conduct in Haiti by pleading such treaty. But conceding that we did take possession of Haiti under a treaty, the reasons which some suppose justifies our Nation's course no longer exist, and we should withdraw our forces and deliver the country back to the people to whom it belongs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Who bears the expense of that occupation—does the American Government bear all expenses of it or is any portion of it charged to the Government of Haiti?

Mr. KING. We bear the expense. All the marines who are there we pay for. The expenses incurred in connection with the keeping of vessels in the harbor we meet. We have a little over 2,000 marines in the island of Haiti, as I now recall, and we bear the expenses of their occupation. All of the expenses incident to the naval occupation of the island are met by the Government of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are taxes imposed upon the people to pay the expenses of the civil administration of the government, or how is it done?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the naval forces are maintained upon the island at the expense of the United States. It has cost the taxpayers of our country tens of millions of dollars to keep warships in Haitian harbors and thousands of marines upon Haitian territory. We have a number of persons employed in the administration of the fiscal affairs of the country, and, as I understand, the taxes imposed upon the people of Haiti are employed in part to pay them.

Mr. President, the people of Haiti have the right to determine their own form of government. It is true that most of the people of Haiti are negroes. Their history is a tragic one. It is also true that they have not made the progress in civil government, in education, and along the lines of the accepted standards of modern civilization that many desired. But the history of the people of Haiti must be remembered. Hundreds of years ago thousands of negroes were taken from Africa and landed in the island of Haiti. They were held in slavery for many years. Finally they threw off the authority of France and established a government of their own. They have made serious mistakes in their governmental affairs. Cruelties and wrongs are recorded upon many pages of their history, and yet they have made progress, and thousands of the Haitian people have attained a high state of culture, education, and refinement. But the mistakes of the people, the limping and imperfect government, the wrongs and oppressions there found, are not sufficient justification for our Government to take possession of the country and impose our will upon them. The people of Haiti have a right, as I have stated, to determine their own course and to determine their own government. They are opposed to our occupation of the island, and they demand that we leave their shores.

My amendment calls for our withdrawal by the 1st of July. That allows several months for the completion of such arrangements as may be regarded as necessary in order that the withdrawal of our forces might not result in any disorder. That will give ample time for the people of Haiti to set up their own government and to put into operation such machinery as they regard as necessary for the conduct of their civil and political affairs.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have listened to the remarks of the able Senator from Utah, and will say just a word in reply, as I am familiar with the situation in regard to our occupation forces in Haiti and San Domingo, because last year I visited those countries with the other members of the committee appointed by the Senate, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], the able chairman of the committee. We held many hearings, covering hundreds and hundreds of hours. We visited the island, traveled extensively, had hearings all over the island, in both Haiti and San Domingo, heard many witnesses, and submitted a report.

As the Senator has not gone into details, I will refrain from doing so, but I would like to call the attention of the Senate to a few matters mentioned in the report, which was made April 20 of this year. I will not go into the history of the occupation, because the time is short, but I will say that our commtitee investigated things thoroughly and carefully, and we submitted a unanimous report. Two Republicans and two Democrats were on the committee, and our unanimous report shows that there were no politics involved. We looked at the matter from an impartial standpoint.

It is well known that there was no popular representative government in Haiti before we went in. The chaos which had existed there since the time the French were driven out by the Haitians in 1804 is a matter of history. It is known that by our convention of 1915 there was provided a receiver of general customs, a financial officer, and a director of public works and sanitation, to be nominated by the President of the United States and appointed by the President of Haiti. I have just visited Haiti in the last two weeks and studied the situation there carefully.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator inform us whether those officials who were appointed, as he has stated, are paid by the Haitian Government or by the American Government? How are they paid?

Mr. ODDIE. I understand that a certain percentage of the internal revenues goes to the payment of some of these officials. The Senator from Ohio is here now, and perhaps he can give some information in regard to the payment of the financial adviser in Haiti.

Mr. MCKELLAR. My question is whether they are paid by the American Government or by the Haitian on San Domingan Government.

Mr. ODDIE. My understanding is that 5 per cent of the internal revenues goes to the payment of those officers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not recall definitely in that respect, but my understanding has been that the marines are paid by the Federal Government, except that portion of the officers of the marines who are in charge of the constabulary or the gendarmerie, as they call it. They are paid by the Haitian Government.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I suppose they are just given salaries in addition to their regular salaries in the Marine Corps. Is that correct? I should think that would be a very reasonable proposition, if they were given additional duties.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not state that with accuracy; I do not know.

Mr. ODDIE. Certain things were suggested by our committee in the report. One was that a commercial adviser be sent down to Haiti; and a man has been sent down there, with the title of trade commissioner, who virtually occupies the position of commercial adviser. He is at present making an exhaustive study of conditions both in Haiti and Cuba. At the request of the President of Haiti a representative has been sent from Tuskegee Institute. Doctor Moton, the president of the institute, was requested to visit Haiti himself and study industrial and commercial conditions and suggest plans for the establishment of vocational education, but he was unable to go himself, and at the request of the President of Haiti, a very able and splendid man, there was sent as his representative Doctor Williams, a prominent and distinguished representative of that institute.

I ask permission to put in the RECORD the report of the committee made June 26 last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Appendix.)

Mr. MCKELLAR. Is that a very long report?

Mr. ODDIE. No; it is not very long.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I would like to read the report. I have sent for a copy of it.

Mr. KING. The whole report has been printed.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have sent for a copy of it, and I would like to read it. I have not read it before.

Mr. ODDIE. It is a very interesting report, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I regret that I have not read it, and I shall read it right away.

Mr. ODDIE. A great deal of very damaging and misleading information has been spread broadcast in this country in regard to the American occupation and in regard to the action of our Marine Corps and our Navy. It is particularly unfortunate that those reports have gotten out, and I hope the American people will take occasion to study this report and study the results that have been obtained in Haiti. I feel sure that our officers and enlisted men there will be amply vindicated and applauded for the splendid work they have done under great difficulties.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a report of the American high commissioner, giving a brief outline of accomplishments in Haiti under his administration since our committee made its report.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RÉSUMÉ OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS IN HAITI.

A measure of the accomplishments of the American occupation in Haiti since the assumption of duties by the American high commissioner on March 13, 1922, is shown in the summary that follows:

POLITICAL.

1. Giving to Haiti for the first time in its history of 118 years an absolutely free election for President of the Republic.
2. The unprecedented spectacle in Haiti of a presidential inauguration, free from military coercion or violence, at which the incoming and the retiring Presidents took part.
3. Centralization of control in the office of the American high commissioner over all officials representing the United States in Haiti, a vitally needed move that has done away with friction, duplication of efforts, and has resulted in full cooperation and interchange of ideas.
4. Full publicity as to the mission of the United States in Haiti through the medium of the Haitian press and by speeches at official functions.
5. Indoctrinating the people with the desire of the United States to uplift the illiterate and poverty-ridden mass of Haiti that constitutes not less than 95 per cent of its population of 2,500,000.
6. Fostering among the people the necessity for all factions working in accord for Haiti through the medium of the press and the circulation of popular slogans emphasizing the necessity.
7. Passage of the law of June 26, 1922, authorizing the loan of $40,000,000 and ratifying the protocol of October 3, 1919, by which the Haitian Government obligated itself to negotiate such a loan.
8. Authorization of the appointment of a claims commission for the settlement of all pending claims against Haiti.
9. Arrangements made for the creation of an internal bond issue for the settlement of the long-standing internal and floating debts.
10. Transfer of the bank contract of the National Bank of the Republic of Haiti, permitting its reorganization along modern American banking lines.
11. Establishment of the Gendarmerie Department of Central Haiti with headquarters at Hinche. This, with the establishment of a court of first instance at Hinche, will make this hitherto isolated interior town one of considerable importance and materially aid in stabilizing this formerly turbulent area.
12. Withdrawal of United States marines from the interior towns of Maissade, Thomonde, and Lascahobas and issuance of orders.

13. Increased efficiency of the gendarmerie by intensive drills, rifle practice, primary education, athletic contests, establishment of finger-print bureau for identification and apprehension of offenders of the law, opening of recruit training stations in central Haiti, introduction of post exchanges and messes modeled after those in the Marine Corps, and material reduction in operating expenses through a depot of supplies to supplant scattered storehouses, and changes in the national penitentiary that have reduced the cost of uniforms and of rations.

ECONOMIC.

1. Comprehensive and detailed agricultural survey of Haiti begun and completed through employment of American agricultural expert who has specialized for many years in tropical countries.

2. Distribution of vegetable seed, both tropical and American in character, to interior locations, the agricultural farm, and through individual growers, with advice as to soil, planting, care, and methods of avoiding and combating crop blights.

3. Taking advantage of the low rate of exchange to purchase certain bonds of the French loan on the Paris market at a discount, thus effecting a considerable saving to the Haitian Government.

4. Establishing of a supply system under the department of public works for the purchase of supplies in bulk, effecting a considerable saving to the Haitian revenues, and installation of modern accounting and loose-leaf ledger systems for all services.

5. Through the services of two expert hydrographers from the United States Geological Survey a thorough foundation for a stream-gauging service, preliminary to irrigation projects on a large scale, has been laid. This work will be continued until records of stream flows throughout Haiti have been completed and the stream-gauging service made a permanent one.

6. In addition to present irrigation on a modest scale in the Leogane, Arcahaie, and Cul de Sac Plains, preliminary surveys for irrigation projects on a large scale have been made. Most important is the study of the irrigation possibilities in the Artibonite Valley that has determined that about 100,000 acres of excellent soil, now unproductive, can be utilized. Another preliminary survey has been made of a project to divert water from the Gros Morne River for irrigation of 6,000 acres in the Gonaives Plain. The completion of a modern concrete diversion dam in the Matheux River, 100 feet long, with steel gates and a light suspension bridge, has diverted the waters of that river into existing irrigation canals on both sides.

7. Steady, permanent improvement has been made in the hydraulic service now operated in nine cities of the Republic. The water-famine problem produced by a severe drought in the vicinity of Cape Haitien, the second largest city, has been solved by sinking artesian wells that will ultimately prove a permanent source of much-needed water supply for the Great Plain of the North. The further utilization of artesian wells will provide supply for small towns suffering from inadequate water. Besides placing the Port au Prince fire department under the gendarmerie, a salt-water fire system delivering a pressure of 150 to 175 pounds in sufficient quantity to serve eight hose lines has been placed in operation.

8. Extended development of water supply for Port au Prince, Gonaives, and Aux Cayes nearing final completion of modern systems. Plans completed for reconstruction of water system at Anse-a-Veau and work commenced.

9. Completion of installation of automatic telephone system in Port au Prince, with 300 telephones in service. Through cooperation of gendarmerie and mayors of towns and utilization of material from discarded overhead system, plans made for three new telephone lines in the north, south, and central regions, respectively.

10. The most important posts in the Republic now have modern telegraph-office equipment and receipts exceed same period last year by 30 per cent. Modern technical training of the personnel has been developed and plans for the complete rehabilitation of the telegraph system completed.

11. The lighthouse service has been extended by installation of four automatic acetylene lighthouses at points most needed by mariners and essential for Haitian commerce. One light, at Cape Dame Marie, has been reported visible at 16 miles. Standard steel buoys have been placed in the harbor at Port au Prince, a tower and structure for lighthouse at Jacmel erected, and the lighting apparatus at Port au Prince remodeled and almost ready for operation.

12. In addition to the usual maintenance and improvement of existing roads, the new dike road in the Artibonite district has been steadily improved, and has resulted in uninterrupted communication along the important St. Marc-Gonaives road, a link in the Port au Prince-Cape Haitien road that was practically impassable for four months of the corresponding period in 1921. The survey and plans for a road to Jacmel from the capital have been completed; preliminary surveys completed for the Lascahobas-Belladere and the Lascahobas-Hinche roads, all vitally needed; and a new maintenance organization for all roads worked out and in active use. Standardized bridges of timber in four lengths are being planned that will meet all needs, and material for 50 is being collected in Port au Prince.

13. A fireproof building for Government archives has been completed in Port au Prince and repairs made to various public buildings. A new school at Jeremie will be ready to accommodate 300 pupils early in October.

14. A comprehensive city planning is well under way for Port au Prince that will combine traffic needs, improvement of the palace grounds and the Champ de Mars, now bare and unattractive settings for the handsome new palace, a botanical garden, and city playgrounds. Haiti to-day is without a children's playground.

15. Following the field survey for oil made last year by the Geological Survey, a pamphlet on Haiti's oil resources has been issued for general distribution by the public works department, which is also preparing to distribute topographical and geological publications that will make available much valuable data.

16. Drafting and submitting to the Haitian Government a modern forestry law, designed to prevent the growing deforestation of the country.

17. Drafting and submitting to the Haitian Government of a traffic law.

18. Drafting and submitting to the Haitian Government of a plan for the formation of a rural police force under the supervision of the gendarmerie.

19. Drawing up a program of development work covering the next two years.

20. The filling in of salt-water marshes and measures to eradicate mosquitoes and other sources of infection, including the continuation of an active campaign against rats, have been carried on at various points. A site for a quarantine station at Port au Prince has been selected and plans for the buildings drawn. At present Haiti has no such station.

21. Hospital construction work includes a ward for tubercular patients at Cape Haitien, completion of an operating room and nurses' quarters for the general hospital, and the erection of two new wards; partial completion of a hospital for Jeremie; and renovation and extension of the hospitals at Gonaives and St. Marc.

22. Free dispensaries have been established at the interior towns of Mirebalais, Hinche, and Grande Riviere du Norde, and large numbers of natives are being treated at these isolated places, where previously no medical treatment was available. Plans for the extension of this service are waiting only on funds.

23. The collection of vital statistics is being developed by the Public Health Service through the cooperation of the gendarmerie and Haitian officials to a point where 60 per cent of the communes are now making returns, as compared with 10 per cent in former years.

24. A complete program for the development of the public health service has been drawn up and the medical survey of Haiti, a stupendous task, has been begun.

SOCIAL.

1. All Americans serving with the occupation have been impressed with the importance of carrying our mission—the development of Haiti—to a point where American supervision can be reduced to a minimum and the military forces withdrawn, to an early and successful goal. The winning of the confidence of the Haitian people and the establishment of friendly relations has progressed visibly in the last six months through this indoctrination.

2. Social relations have steadily increased and contributed measurably to this end.

3. The establishment of free dispensaries, the extension of roads and trails, the improvement of hospitals, safeguarding of health, and the raising of the day wage of labor from a gourde to a gourde and a half have strongly contributed to the progress of our mission.

4. Opening additional commissions in the gendarmerie to the best class of Haitians, replacing the old type of personal aids to the president by the aspirants for commissions, allowing them to conduct unassisted a weekly military ceremony on the Champ de Mars to which many Haitians are attracted, have also done much to win approval by the best elements.

5. The education of the gendarmes and the increase in their efficiency has had a splendid moral effect. Scattered through many cities in every district of the country, these native troops are becoming a fast-growing factor in the spreading of American educational, sanitary, and governmental methods.

6. The physicians of Port au Prince are naturally a most influential class. Plans for the reorganization of the medical department of the gendarmerie include the employment of Haitian physicians. In addition, arrangements have been concluded with the president of the National Medical School for the use of the facilities at the general hospital in the instruction of Haitian medical students. Classes will be held in every phase of surgical, medical, administrative, and laboratory work. Promising students will be appointed as internes and openings found for them in the public health service of the island. In addition to this spirit of cooperation, which has broken down a former antagonistic feeling, the central laboratory of the general hospital is prepared to undertake any research or routine work requested by the members of the Haitian medical fraternity.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask further to have printed in the RECORD an indoctrination report of the Marine Corps brigade commander in Santo Domingo regarding the attitude of the marines in Santo Domingo toward the Dominican people. It gives a brief outline of our occupation and of the results, as well as outlining the proper attitude of our marines to the Dominican people. From personal observations and knowledge I can state that this has been well lived up to. It is printed in very clear and simple form, and I think it will be very interesting as well as beneficial to the American people.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDOCTRINATION ANENT PROPER ATTITUDE OF FORCES OF OCCUPATION TOWARD DOMINICAN GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE.

PART I.

The officers and men of this brigade have heard a great deal of the attitude they must bear toward the people of the Dominican Republic, and it is the desire of the commanding general that this subject be summed up and made clear to all concerned. In addition to the many steps the commanding general has already taken to make this matter clear to all of us, the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, and the major general commandant have repeatedly urged upon us that the marines on duty in this Republic represent the United States in this Republic, and the conduct of the marines here constitutes those visible marks from which the Dominican people judge the United States. The commanding general in turn has done his utmost to impress this upon the officers and men of this brigade.

If all the members of this brigade will constantly bear that one point in mind, namely, that their personal conduct in this Republic becomes the conduct and acts of this country, there should never be cause for criticism. Marines have never failed to accomplish their mission when called upon to serve their country, and in order that we will execute our mission in this Republic it is necessary that all of us understand what it is, and there is no doubt as to what our mission is—it is to help this Republic and its people.

Now, to make that mission clear to you it is only necessary to point out the cause of the occupation and what the occupation has accomplished, and to show you that one thing only remains to be done, and that is the accomplishment of that last thing—the personal cooperation of every man in this brigade is a more important feature than it has ever been before. That one thing is to return to the people of this Republic their "self-government," returning it in a way that makes clear to the Dominican people that the United States has helped, and it has done so unselfishly.

To consider the cause of the occupation: The forces of the United States did not enter this Republic to make war on the Dominican people. Far from it. The United States and the Dominican Republic in 1907 entered into a convention, or treaty, which provided for the assistance of the United States in the collection and application of the customs revenues of the Dominican Republic. This agreement between the two countries provided that until the Dominican Republic had paid the whole amount of the bonds of its debt its public debt should not be increased except by previous agreement between the Dominican Government and the United States.

Owing to the failure of the Dominican Government in complying with this provision, probably because of the revolutions occurring in the Republic which deprived the Republic of a stable government, and the expense incurred in repressing such revolution, and owing to the danger of such revolutions to the Dominican people themselves as well as citizens of other countries who might be in the Republic, the United States Government directed its naval authorities to assume charge in the Republic and restore tranquillity. Marines were landed in this country during 1916 to preserve order, and a little later—in November, 1916—a military government was set up by the United States to conduct the affairs of the Republic and maintain order. The military government was announced to the Dominican people by a proclamation, and that proclamation pointed out to the Dominican people that the object was to restore and maintain peace and order, called upon all persons to assist in this object, and stated that only those persons who opposed this objective of peace and order would become liable to military discipline.

The object of the United States as explained in the beginning has never changed. It has been throughout the occupation to this time of returning the Government to the Dominican people an unselfish object, looking only toward the betterment of the Dominican people, and at great expense to the United States. It might be pointed out that the laws of nations give to one nation which occupies another's land the right to support the occupation by taxation levied upon the country occupied. The United States has never even considered causing the Dominican people to defray the cost of the occupation in such a manner, but has itself borne the entire cost. And what are we trying to buy with the millions of dollars expended in six years of such an occupation? The answer is the betterment of the Dominican people and their peace and prosperity and their consequent good will to us.

Now ask yourself if your conduct in your attitude toward the Dominican people is as worthy as that of your country, and bear in mind that your conduct represents the United States in the eyes of the Dominican people. Can you not see that ungentlemanly acts on the part of any man in this brigade toward the Dominican people counteract upon the efforts of the United States in seeking the good will of the Dominican people? Every time a member of this brigade commits an act of abuse upon a citizen or resident of this Republic he brings forth the criticism of the Dominican people. And where does that criticism fall? Upon the man who committed the abuse? No; but upon the United States and its officials and officers. Your President receives the blame, your whole Government receives the blame, your Marine Corps and my Marine Corps receives the blame, and especially your commanding general and officers of this brigade.

This last statement may seem to you to be exaggerated, but let's consider this and see if it does not work out in just that way. Some member of the brigade assaults a Dominican citizen. That citizen tells the story, and it is retold again and again, and here, as the world over, the story grows with each telling. It is published in the Dominican press, and the Dominican people are astounded that American marines should so abuse their people. Prominent Dominicans forward the story to their friends in the United States and it is taken up by the American press, maybe in Congress, and the blame is laid upon the whole Marine Corps.

Perhaps you do not yet understand why such a small matter should get such publicity. That can be made clear also. There are several reasons, the most important of which is that there are people who are opposed to the occupation of this Republic, and that opposition includes both Dominicans and Americans.

Probably there are Dominicans who believe that the United States has some object in the occupation other than that which it has expressed, for instance, acquiring Dominican territory or taking the Dominican Republic under its protection and requiring revenue in the way of taxation and by other means from the Republic. Also the bandits who style themselves as revolutionists and prey upon the country were greatly opposed to the American occupation. I say "were opposed" because we pride ourselves that we have broken up banditry in the Dominican Republic. Also there are Dominican citizens of high standing who, although they know that the United States is their friend, feel that their independence and the sovereignty of their nation is so dear to them that they want to govern themselves, even though they can not do it as well as we can.

Also, there are people in the United States who agree with these Dominicans who feel that they should conduct their own Government, and then there are people in the United States who are opposed to this occupation for political reasons.

Now you can see why we are subject to criticism. The supporters of the occupation can not always be exploiting the good work of the occupation, while the opponents of the occupation are always ready to criticize, and therefore the Marine Corps, which is actually conducting the occupation under orders from higher authority, becomes the subject of this criticism. This is being explained to you in order that you may understand how easily we can subject ourselves to criticism in the hope that you will carefully avoid all opportunity for criticism.

PART II.

We have already discussed the occupation in the light of its cause and object, and now we will consider the way in which the occupation has been conducted, its accomplishments, the hopes for the future of those who have conducted it, and their pride in its accomplishments. I will point out right here what bearing this has on the individual conduct of each of us. It is up to each of us to do our part as well as those who have already conspicuously obtained success in their part in the occupation.

Our individual part is to perform the duties assigned to us, and perform them well; and in addition, as has already been pointed out, to make our attitude and conduct toward the Dominican people worthy of our country and its object in this occupation. And now I want to point out that we must take individual pride in the accomplishments of the occupation, which are our accomplishments, and that we must conduct ourselves in a way which will show that we are proud of those accomplishments and ready and anxious to live up to them.

During the occupation and up to the inauguration of the present provisional government the affairs of the Dominican Republic have been administered by a military governor, usually a rear admiral of the United States Navy, and a staff composed of naval and marine officers, which staff corresponded generally to the Cabinet of the President of the United States. The officers of this staff had charge of governmental departments, such as department of interior and police, department of public instruction, etc., and administered the affairs of those departments under the direction of the military governor.

In addition, the Republic has been garrisoned by a brigade of marine, who have maintained peace, order, and tranquility and at the same time trained a military force composed of Dominicans, now known as the Policia Nacional Dominicana, which force is now acting as the national police force of the Republic. The brigade is still assisting in the training of this national police force at the request of the Dominican people. The brigade is remaining here until the recently elected provisional government turns over to a duly elected constitutional government for the purpose of assisting in the training of the Policia Nacional Dominicana and also to lend our moral support to the Policia Nacional Dominicana in their work of maintaining peace and order.

Remember that last statement. We are lending our moral support and that necessarily means that we set the example. If we are to set the example for the Policia Nacional Dominicana, let's set a good one and show them that we bear ourselves with dignity and courtesy.

Now let's see what we have accomplished for the Dominican Republic during the occupation.

In the development of the country first consideration has been given to the opening of the country by construction of roads. The national highway from Santo Domingo City to Monte Cristi, connecting the northern and southern coasts of the island, has been completed. The completion of that road in May, 1922, marks the beginning of a new era in the Dominican Republic. Before the construction of that road the northern and southern Provinces of the Republic had little communication with each other. Now they are connected by a first-class road, and travel from the northern coast to the southern coast is only a matter of a few hours.

Union of the Dominican people and prosperity for the country will be the result of that road. Other roads have been constructed throughout the Island, making travel throughout the Republic possible. Furthermore, these roads give military control of the whole Republic to the Government and its military police force.

These roads have been accomplished only through the persevering efforts of the officers in charge of their construction, and they stand as a monument to the American occupation.

Bridges have been built in this Republic under our administration; railroads have been improved; wharves and customhouses have been built and harbors improved; radio communication has been established; telephone and post-office systems improved, and all other means of communication vastly improved. Numerous other public works have been accomplished to expedite the development of the country.

Great progress has been made by the military government in the matter of the education of Dominican people. When the military government was established the system of education was entirely inadequate, and politics were supreme in the school administration.

To-day schools have been established all over the Republic, even in the rural districts, and the children of Santo Domingo are attending. A department of education has been established and has for several years been energetically striving to completely banish illiteracy in the Dominican Republic. We have turned over to the provisional government a sound system of schools and education, which, if continued, will insure the education of the Dominican people in the years to come.

We have accomplished many other things; but, lest we be considered boastful, we will only discuss one more, namely, the military assistance given, which includes the elimination of banditry and the organization of the Policia Nacional Dominicana. The latter we have already touched upon.

From the beginning of the occupation up to a few months before the inauguration of the provisional government we have worked hard to eliminate banditry in this Republic and have met with complete success. The bandits to whom we refer were armed groups who preyed upon the Dominican people and lived upon the countryside. Some of these styled themselves as patriots or revolutionists opposed to the American occupation. Whatever their status, they were preying upon the Dominican people and were in armed resistance to the object of the United States forces. Our forces have kept them on the run and made life pretty uncomfortable for them, until finally the remaining few decided that banditry was not such a great life after all and surrendered themselves and their arms.

Now, let us all consider these accomplishments and take pride in them. Then let us conduct ourselves in a way that will show that we are proud of these accomplishments; let us continue the help that we have been giving them by treating them as the good citizens that they are. Make them feel that the United States is their friend—even more, the best friend they have ever had.

PART III.

We have considered the occupation in the light of its cause and object and in its accomplishments. We will now consider our remaining object and the importance of it. We have started on the last lap of the race, and in this race, as in every race, success depends on that last lap. Marines have taken part in many a race, and it has never been their habit to falter in the last lap. That is where we have always expended our every effort to win.

The last lap in this race is the turning over of the governing power to the Dominican people. The turnover has been started, but it is not a matter that can be accomplished in a day. A provisional government has been inaugurated and has commenced its work. That government is to institute certain reforms in the election law and then provide for the election of a constitutional government. Upon the inauguration of the constitutional government and the accomplishment of the necessary agreements between the United States and the Dominican Republic the United States will then completely withdraw its forces from this Republic.

This is not a matter to be accomplished in a day. It must not be done hastily. The provisional government has a great deal to do in order to establish a constitutional government which will be insured of stability and success. The provisional government is therefore more or less on trial in the eyes of the Dominican people and in the eyes of the world.

The Policia Nacional Dominicana is on trial in maintaining peace and order in the Republic. That military body is a product of our own labors, and its success will be our success. Are you going to help it or hinder it? Are you going to help the provisional government or hinder it? Are you going to help your country in attaining its object? I can answer every one of those questions for you. You are going to help in every way you can think of, but what you must guard against is thoughtlessness, and this especially in your relations with the Dominican people. We are here to give our moral support to the Policia Nacional Dominicana and the provisional government. Then let us do it. Never interfere with a member of the Policia Nacional Dominicana or the municipal police in the performance of their duty.

Never start a disturbance with Dominicans. If you want to fight, put on the gloves and start training for the next boxing meet; you can find any number of men right here in your own camp who will give you a more exciting scrap than Dominicans will, and you can win a boxing belt instead of bread and water.

Carefully avoid any kind of trouble with the Dominican people. Don't start an argument with a Dominican because you don't like the way he looked at you. Avoid trouble with them. Don't you pride yourself that your intelligence is superior to theirs? Then isn't it up to you to avoid trouble? Make your every act a friendly one; never an unfriendly one.

Remember that you are a marine, a member of a strong armed body. In the eyes of these people every unfriendly act you commit against them they regard as oppression. They consider themselves defenseless against you. It has never been the creed of marines to oppress the weak, but on the contrary we try to help them. Live up to the traditions of your corps.

Perhaps you have considered the occupation in the light that these little talks have tried to explain it. I am trying to show you the occupation in its true light and acquaint you with the entire situation. Every man here is a part of the brigade and should be interested in why we are here, what we have done, and what we are going to do. This is really an appeal to every one of you, as a good marine, to carry out our mission. The commanding general believes that it is only necessary that you understand what is wanted in order that you will give it.

We have not had a great many cases of abuse of Dominican people by marines. In this last lap of the race we don't want to have any. If such cases do arise, I unhesitatingly tell you that the offenders will be punished to the limit, for such offenders bring discredit to the entire brigade. I want to illustrate to you the extent of the discredit brought upon the brigade by offenders of this class. The commanding general is required to make a report each month to the major general commandant concerning the extent to which this brigade has become indoctrinated with the correct attitude toward the Dominican people as evidenced by the elimination of just complaints against its personnel. In that report are included any offenses committed by marines against Dominicans. If a marine assault a Dominican, the facts are included in that report, together with information as to action taken. This information is available to the Navy Department and State Department, and the officials of the United States Government have just cause to feel that a man who commits such an offense is not serving his country as he should and as marines have always done. Such offenses are a reflection upon the entire brigade and the entire Marine Corps, and we must eliminate all such offenses. The major general commandant has asked the commanding general to impress upon the members of this brigade that whether marines are guarding the mails in the United States or guaranteeing the maintenance of peace and order in a foreign country, they are equally in the public eye at home and must so conduct themselves in their relations with civilians as to make it plain to the latter that United States marines are the friends of law and order.

The commanding general further desires to impress upon you that you can not make it plain to the Dominican people that you are the friends of law and order if you cause or participate in disorders.

The United States and its representatives here, and that includes all of us, have worked hard in the Dominican Republic and we hope for its success in the future. The success of the Dominican Republic will be our success and will constitute another bright page in the history of the Marine Corps. We hope that the Dominican people will carry on the improvements we have inaugurated, carry on the construction of roads and other public works, the dissemination of education and knowledge, and even inaugurate progress of their own. We hope that the Dominican Government will do many things to obtain prosperity for its people; all of this we hope for and feel that it will be done. The sooner the Dominican people govern themselves and conduct their affairs without the active assistance of the United States the more rapid their progress will be and the greater their interest and pride in their progress will be.

Therefore we want to do everything we can to assist in the success of the present provisional government in order that it may establish the constitutional government and the Dominican ship of state start its cruise.

During this period of transition let us all be friends of law and order. Seek clean amusement instead of trying to paint the town red. Remember that we are not now conducting the affairs of the Dominican Republic, but the Dominican people are on trial in conducting their own affairs, and let us stand off and maintain the attitude of dignity and courtesy that the commanding general asks of us.

In conclusion, let us recall that one point we discussed in the beginning, that our conduct here is our country's conduct. We are writing our little page in the history of the Marine Corps, and we are at the bottom of that page; it relates to the occupation of the Dominican Republic. So far that page reads mighty well. Let us write the last paragraph in a way that in the years to follow it will stand as a page so bright that even the Marine Corps will consider it a guide and example well to be followed.

Prepared by brigade law officer to serve as basis for lectures to be delivered to personnel of brigade.

HEADQUARTERS SECOND BRIGADE, UNITED STATES MARINES,
Santo Domingo City, D. R., October 30, 1922.

Issued this date.

HARRY LEE,
Brigadier General, United States Marine Corps,
Commanding Second Brigade United States Marines.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I would like to go into this matter in greater detail, because I have given it very careful study, as have the other members of our committee, but I shall not take the time to do so now. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], chairman of the committee, has shown great ability in directing its investigations. I wish only to say that I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will not be agreed to, and that Senators who have received information contrary to the report of the committee and other matters I have submitted will further study the subject and get their information from the real and legitimate sources—our State Department, our Marine Corps, and our Navy.

APPENDIX.

[Senate Report No. 794, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.]

INQUIRY INTO OCCUPATION AND ADMINISTRATION OF HAITI AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. ODDIE (for Mr. MCCORMICK), from the Select Committee on Haiti and the Dominican Republic, submitted the following report, pursuant to Senate Resolution 112:

The select committee of the Senate to investigate the occupation and administration of territories of the Republic of Haiti and of the Dominican Republic by American naval forces presents herewith a report upon the occupation of Haitian territory and the relation of the United States to the Government of Haiti.

The island of Haiti, midway between Cuba and Porto Rico, supports a population as numerous as that of Cuba (about three and a quarter million souls) upon a territory about three-quarters as large as that of Cuba. It is therefore noteworthy in considering the economic and social condition of the inhabitants of the island of Haiti that during recent years the export and import trade of the island has averaged perhaps one-tenth of the volume of Cuban foreign trade. Porto Rico, with a territory equal to one-fifth of that of the island of Haiti and with a population of about a million and a quarter, has exported and imported about twice as much as has the neighboring island.

While the Cuban interior may be reached from all ports by connecting railways, and while Porto Rico is covered with a network of splendid highways, and while its ports are united by a coastwise railway system, the whole island of Haiti prior to the coming of the Americans in 1915 had absolutely no through and thorough highways and no railways other than half a dozen unremunerative, unsuccessful, and incomplete spurs of track running inland from different points of the coast. In a country without highways and without railways, and in which even the few trails were impassable during unseasonable weather, it is not surprising that agriculture, industry, and trade all languished and that the overwhelming majority of the population has been utterly poor and illiterate.

THE ECONOMIC ATROPHY OF HAITI.

Improved roads are an index to the industrial development of any country.

The French prior to 1800 had built about 550 miles of public roads in Haiti. Some of these were said by French writers to equal the best highways in France leading to the Versailles. The Haitians overthrew the French in 1804. The roads fell in disuse. The torrential rains which visit the island and the tropical vegetation, which grows rapidly in the island, soon made these roads for the most part almost impassable. When the Americans took possession there were not to exceed 210 miles of these French roads which were passable by wheeled vehicles even in dry weather.

The American authorities since their intervention in 1915 have built 385 miles of new construction and repaired 200 miles of old construction. Such highways as were passable even in dry weather were for the most part along the coast line. With these exceptions, there was no way of getting to or from the coastal cities and towns to the interior except over trails through the forests no more clearly defined than were the Indian trails through the virgin forests of America before the white man had set foot therein.

Women and burros were the burden bearers of the country. All products which were brought into the market or taken into the interior from the coastal cities and towns were borne by the women carrying their burdens upon their heads or upon the backs of their burros.

The territory of the Republic of Haiti comprises one-third of the area of the island, the other two-thirds being included in the territory of the Dominican Republic. Three-quarters of the total population of the island inhabits the one-third of its area, which is subject to the sovereignty of the Haitian Republic.

There are two distinct social entities in Haiti—two Haitis, as it were—one living in the coastal cities and towns. About 2 per cent, and certainly not exceeding 5 per cent, of the total population represents the wealth and culture of the island. They embrace the governing class. They do not divide politically as our people do. The dividing line politically is between the "outs" and the "ins." A substantial army has been maintained by the Government. Without it in the past no government could have come into existence or could have maintained its existence for any length of time. The "outs" seeking to get in have never hesitated to make an alliance with the Caco or bandit chiefs and organize revolutionary forces to march against the capital at any time they thought to be propitious.

The other very distinct element embraces 95 per cent or more of the entire population. They constitute the peasant class. They can neither read nor write. They have no conception of government. They have been the pawns of the governing class. Their condition is truly pathetic. Naturally generous and kind, with proper training and education they can become prosperous cultivators, capable of guarding their own interests.

Before the American marines landed in 1915 men did not dare to leave their humble homes in the interior recesses of the island lest they should be impressed into military service by either the Government or the revolutionists. They knew not what hour of the day or the night they might be seized by military officers or Caco chiefs, taken from their homes, and forced into service.

Their animals and the products of their little gardens were continuously being confiscated without compensation, and when the women took their produce to the markets in the cities and towns they were never certain that the little money they received for it would not be taken from them.

Now conditions are changed. Naturally the peasants want Haiti for the Haitians. But at the same time, with very rare exceptions, the peasant class realize that since the American intervention for the first time in their history they are free from impressment into military service. They are no longer plundered by Cacos and bandits, and they are secure in the possession of their families and their property.

Haitian government prior to 1915 afforded neither protection nor service to the Haitian people. The Haitian peasant was burdened with heavy taxes, and for the most part no account was kept of the receipts or disbursements. No police protection was furnished the people in the interior. Hospital facilities in the cities and towns were inadequate and insanitary. No internal improvements were made for the benefit of the people.

One single disclosure made during the course of the hearings in Port au Prince will be interesting. It is typical.

Doctor Sylvain, president of the Union Patriotique, was before the committee. He was asked concerning their educational system. He testified that the Republic of Haiti had compulsory education in the island since 1864; and yet only 2 per cent of the people can read and write. What a commentary on Haitian administration!

Under Haitian government teachers of music were hired who could not tell whether a sheet of music was right side up or upside down; teachers of drawing who could not draw a picture of an ordinary bucket; and in their courts subordinate judges who could neither read nor write. And it may be said that no other branch of governmental activity was far in advance of their educational system.

One word as to the material progress of the peasant class. Before the American intervention few of the Haitians had ever seen a plow. The peasant class had never seen and did not know how to use a shovel. At first, when shovels were given to them for use, they would take them to a pile of gravel, pick the gravel up in their hands, put it in the shovel, and then carry it to the place where it was intended to be placed. When the American marines began road building in the island a schooner with road-building machinery was docked. In the hold of the vessel were 60 wheelbarrows. A captain of the marines in charge of the road building sent the foreman, a Haitian, with 60 men to bring the wheelbarrows to the place where the road building was in progress. After a time he looked for the men with the wheelbarrows. He saw them carrying the wheelbarrows on their heads instead of wheeling them.

The committee does not refer to these conditions in a critical spirit, or for the purpose of humiliating the Haitians, but because it is necessary that the American people shall know conditions as they are in order to enable them to determine what ought to be done at present and in the immediate future, and the committee says this looking solely to the benefit of the Haitian people and without any purpose, direct or indirect, looking to any material benefit to be derived by the Government of the United States from its temporary control or occupation of the island save and except such as would come to us as the benefactor of an unfortunate people.

HAITIAN HISTORY.

No review of the condition of Haiti can be just to its inhabitants which does not recognize existing anomalies and the antecedent historic facts which explain the economic and political backwardness of a people among whom may be found groups whose cultivation, education, and capabilities are comparable with corresponding elements of society in more advanced countries.

At the time of the overthrow of the French government and of the expulsion of their French masters by the Haitians there were among the former slaves to whom the government of the country fell few who were literate and absolutely none who were so trained in public affairs or who were so skilled in tropical agriculture as to make possible either the successful maintenance of civil order or the necessary continued development of the country's agricultural resources. Thus the Haitians labored under insuperable handicaps. There were among them for all practical purposes no trained agriculturists and administrators, no engineers and educators. Haiti had no means of educating her people or of developing men competent to govern. Misgovernment and revolution ensued, and as a consequence Haitian trade, by comparison with that of the other West Indian islands, diminished. Haiti drifted, as it were, out of the currents of commerce.

During the six-score years of Haitian independence there have been a dozen constitutions. The people have lived under self-styled monarchs as well as under military dictators and self-constituted presidents.

Since the Haitians gained control in 1804 there have been one series of revolutions after another. Part have been successful, part unsuccessful. Since 1804 there have been 29 chiefs of state. Otto Schoenrich in his work on Santo Domingo says:

"It is to be observed, however, that of the Haitian executives only one completed his term of office and voluntarily retired; of the others four remained in power until their death from natural causes, 18 were deposed by revolutions, one of them committing suicide, another being executed on the steps of his burning palace, and still another being cut to pieces by the mob; five were assassinated; and one is chief magistrate at the present time."

The disorders to which Haiti has been subject since the achievement of its independence attained such destructive frequency during the last decade before the American intervention in 1915 that in the space of 10 years no less than eight Presidents assumed office (it would be a mistake to say that they were elected) for the nominal constitutional term of seven years each. Three of the eight fled the country; one was blown up in the presidential palace; another died mysteriously, and according to popular belief by poison, while two were murdered. The last Haitian President who held office before the landing of the American forces was Sam, who had caused several scores of political prisoners to be massacred as they huddled in their cells. He himself was dragged from the French Legation by a mob, his head and limbs were torn from his body to be carried aloft on sticks and bayonets, while his bleeding trunk was dragged through the streets of the capital city.

It will not be wondered that under conditions thus indicated the irrigation works and highways built by the French disappeared, fertile sugar plantations vanished, coffee cultivation ceased, and that the country made no progress, material or social, political or economic. The mass of the people—gentle, kindly, generous—their peace and property threatened rather than secured by the so-called authorities, sought such quiet as they might find by hiding in the hills, where they have lived in a condition of primitive poverty and ignorance. Not only did the sugar and coffee plantations disappear, but almost all true agriculture, all organized cultivation of the soil, except as little patches of yams and plantains may be called such, ceased. The coffee crop, which is the principal article of Haitian export, is gathered from the wild trees—sprung from the stock planted by the French over a hundred years ago. The domestic animals include wretched swine, poor cattle, poultry of scrawny Tropic strains, and little asses which, as saddle or pack animals, served as the sole means of conveyance or transport in the country until the arrival of the American forces.

NO REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN HAITI.

In brief, before American intervention there had been no popular representative or stable government in Haiti. The public finances were in disarray, public credit was exhausted, and the public revenues were wasted or stolen. Highways and agriculture had given way to the jungle. The people, most of whom lived in wretched poverty, were illiterate and spoke no other language than the native Creole. The country and its inhabitants have been a prey to chronic revolutionary disorders, banditry, and even during periods of comparative peace to such oppressive and capricious governors that the great mass of the people, who under happier circumstances might have become prosperous peasant farmers, have had neither opportunity nor incentive to labor, to save, or to learn. They had no security for their property and little for their lives. Voodoo practices, of course, were general throughout the territory of the Republic.

This view has been contested by certain Americans who, equally ignorant of the facts and indifferent to them, have given voice to general and unsubstantiable charges which if credited would blacken the good name of the American Navy and impugn the honor of the American Government. It is, however, the view of your committee, and is supported by those informed and impartial investigators of Haitian conditions whose opinions have come to the attention of your committee.

HAITIAN OPINION.

Lest this summary of Haitian conditions be considered prejudiced or overdrawn, the committee quotes the following from the report of the Haitian Commission of Verification of Documents of the Floating Debt.

"But neither the Pressoit-Delbau Commission, nor the successors of Mr. Barjon in the position of paymaster of the Department of the Interior have been able to tell the Secretary of State for Finance what has become of those archives. Only one fact remains, from all the preceding, and it is to be remembered; that is, that the said archives have disappeared, and that they remain unfindable, for a cause which the commission is not in a position to verify nor to comment upon. * * *

"This great question of the revolutionary debts—of the revolutionary debt of Davilmar Theodore above all—constitutes the most delicate and certainly the most painful of the work of the commission. Without doubt, we have not the mission, Mr. Secretary of State, to judge the motives, interested or not, which determined and guided the conduct and the acts of such a chief, of such a political group, in the course of the years forever ill omened before the month of July, 1915. In any case, this mission is not imparted to us, if at least we confine ourselves to considering strictly and narrowly our attributions of commissioners charged to investigate the arrears of the floating debt. * * *

"This expression 'revolutionary debt' carries in itself its condemnation, by reason of the lugubrious ideas which it awakens in the mind. From the moment that our internal torments had to have as a final consequence the issuance of certificates of indebtedness of the State, to the profit of their authors of all classes, or, which means the same things, the flood of favors to the detriment of the national treasury, a premium was thus created to the profit of Haitian revoluntionaryism. And it is thus that we have attended in these recent times this sad pageant marking the pages of our history; the revolution of the day being an appeal to the revolution of to-morrow; insurrection never disarmed, always erect and campaigning, perpetually assailing the supreme power, and never stopping but to divide the spoils of the hour, after the enthronement of the new idol which it was to undermine and overthrow.

"In presence of the figures at once scandalous and formidable of the debt called revolutionary and in view of the deplorable conditions in which the different original notes were issued, whether at Ouanaminthe, at Pignor, at St. Michel, at Cape Haitien, at Port au Prince, and even at Kingston (Jamaica), finally a little everywhere; some in Haitien gourdes, the others in American gold, pounds sterling, or in francs—the commission thinks it opportune to make without offense or passion the following remarks which it offers for the meditation of the country. * * *

"There is no really productive work without the help of capital.

"But when the loan is contracted for an unavowable purpose, having for motive the arming of the citizens of a country against their fellows, sustaining a disastrous and debasing war, sowing terror in all the social levels, with a view of satisfying personal ambitions—oh, then the conditions are not longer the same, and we find ourselves here in face of a hidden operation.

"Incontestably, wherever civil war has passed it has sowed destruction, disunion, and death; cities devastated, factories destroyed, families reduced to the most frightful misery, the pleasant fields of the north transformed into charnal places three or more years ago; all these horrors worthy of the times of antiquity and of savage hordes have caused and still cause the raising of cries of pain and of indignation, and retell for ages and ages the cruelty of the political leaders who conducted directly or indirectly the bands of madmen and who excited them to carnage in the sole and unique purpose of seizing the power for the purpose of better assaulting the public treasury.

"The country can not make itself the accomplice of such financial disorder having hidden behind it crime and immorality.

"The mass of notes issued, the considerable number of individuals who had or who arrogated to themselves the power of issue, and who unscrupulously, without restraint or the least reserve, thus compromised the future; the colossal figure to which these issues mounted have necessarily given birth in our mind to this question of palpitating interest, In what case can the recognizances issued be considered sincere? In what case are they not sincere? In other terms, when is it that the amounts subscribed have been really paid? When is it that we are found in the presence of fictitious values represented by notes of complaisance? * * *

"Revolutions are possible only on the condition that their authors find interested persons to finance these criminal enterprises. Unhappily with us the hard and honest work was always the exception, the revolutionary politics the rule, the great industry which attracted to it and monopolized all—energy, intelligence, and capacity. Therefore, there came a moment when the sole preoccupation for each energy unemployed, each intelligence searching its way, each capacity desirous of exerting itself; it was to clothe himself in revolutionary livery in which a campaign was instituted to gain access to the public treasury."

Testimony taken by the committee shows how the chronic anarchy into which Haiti had fallen, the exhaustion of its credit, the threatened intervention of the German Government, and the actual landing of the French naval forces all imperiled the Monroe doctrine and lead the Government of the United States to take the successive steps set forth in the testimony, to establish order in Haiti, to help to institute a government as nearly representative as might be, and to assure the collaboration of the Governments of the United States and Haiti for the future maintenance of peace and the development of the Haitian people.

Your committee believes that doubtless the American representatives might have done better, and that they have made mistakes which, in the light of experience, they would not make again; that, as will presently be indicated in more detail, not only did the treaty fail to take cognizance of certain reforms essential to Haitian progress but that in the choice of its agents and the determination of their responsibilities the Government of the United States was not always happy.

THE OCCUPATION AND THE TREATY.

The history of the landing of American naval forces in Haiti and of the intervention of the United States to establish a government as representative, stable, and effective as possible is set forth at length in the public hearings of the committee. The naval forces of the United States landed in July, 1915, when the country, and more particularly the capital, after the murder of President Sam, had fallen into a condition of anarchy. The diplomatic representatives and naval forces of the United States made it possible for the Haitian Assembly to sit in security. The American representatives, in the opinion of your committee, influenced the majority of the assembly in the choice of a President. Later they exercised pressure to induce the ratification by Haiti of the convention in September, 1915, precisely as the United States had exercised pressure to induce the incorporation of the Platt amendment in the Cuban constitution, thus to assure the tranquillity and prosperity of Cuba. At about the same time representatives of the United States Navy took over temporarily the administration of the Haitian customhouses, which were then answerable to no central control, of which the revenues were disposed of at the discretion of the various local customs officers.

The convention of 1915 provides that a receiver general of customs, a financial adviser, and directors of public works and sanitation shall be nominated by the President of the United States and appointed by the President of the Republic of Haiti. It provides, furthermore, for the organization and discipline of an adequate force of constabulary or gendarmerie under the direction of officers nominated by the President of the United States but commissioned in the service of the Haitian Government by the President of the Republic of Haiti.

Your committee has sought carefully to measure the benefits accruing to the Haitian people as the result of the convention and to determine wherein the American Government or its representatives had failed in their duty and to advise as to the correction of mistakes or abuses in order that the maintenance of American forces in Haiti may be terminated as soon as possible.

Peace, sure and undisturbed peace, has been established throughout Haiti for the first time in generations. In former years men who were peasants—countrymen—were never seen upon the trails or in the market towns. They feared to appear lest they be pressed into the wretched and underpaid forces of the Republic or of revolutionary pretenders. Women only were found, driving pack animals or carrying burdens on the trails and chaffering in the market places. The men were hidden in the hills. To-day, as old travelers will bear witness, for the first time in generations the men have come down freely from their hidden huts to the trails and to the towns.

Conformably with the terms of the treaty, the Haitian customs have been administered by the American receiver efficiently and honestly, whereas in the past, by common confession, the administration of them was characterized by waste, discrimination, if not by peculation. The minister of finance has acceded to the disbursement of revenues under American supervision. Finally, although the Haitian Government has declined to employ American experts in the administration of internal revenues, nevertheless, under the insistence of the financial adviser and despite general business depression, the sum of internal revenue collected has increased threefold, although the internal revenue laws are unchanged.

There has been very little criticism of the collection of customs under American supervision or of the American receiver general. The financial adviser has been the object of bitter attack, partly because of his personal relations with Haitian officials, partly because under instruction of the Secretary of State he withheld salaries of the principal Haitian officials as a measure of coercion, and partly because he has been more than once and for long periods in Washington, absent from his post of duty in Port au Prince. In justice to the financial adviser it must be said that he was ordered to Washington by the State Department and has remained in Washington by order of the State Department to further the negotiation of the loan for the refunding of the Haitian debt.

THE HAITIAN DEBT.

It has been stated that the Haitian Government had never defaulted on the service of its foreign debts prior to the American occupation. This statement is not exactly correct, but it is undoubtedly true that it had exerted itself to an extraordinary degree to maintain the service of its foreign debts. Your committee is informed that to do this the Haitian Government had during the three years immediately preceding the occupation floated internal loans, at the rates of 59, 56, and 47, to a gold value of $2,868,131; had defaulted on salaries, pensions, etc., to the extent of $1,111,280; had borrowed from the Bank of Haiti $1,733,000; had issued fiat paper money, and had borrowed to a very large amount from private individuals at enormous discounts on treasury notes.

The Haitian Government had, at the time of the American intervention, totally exhausted its credit both at home and abroad. The amortization of the loan of 1875 was in arrears. A great deal has been made of the fact that after the naval forces took over the administration of the customhouses and after the outbreak of the Great War, there was a time when, despite careful administration, both interest and amortization due on the Haitian debt were unpaid. This is true, but the inability of the Haitian Government and its American advisers to pay was due to the state of anarchy into which the country had fallen and to the inestimable injury to Haitian trade with Europe consequent upon the outbreak of the Great War. During the last three years $5,000,000 of interest and principal have been paid. To-day there is no interest or capital overdue. The foreign debt has been reduced by one-third. On the contrary, there is a surplus in the treasury and it is proposed to refund the outstanding debt to the great benefit of the Haitian taxpayer.

The Republic of Haiti owes, largely in France, some $14,000,000, part of which could have been paid when the franc was at a discount of 17 to the dollar, and which can now be paid while exchange stands at about 10 francs to the dollar. The Haitian Government has lost something over a million dollars by delaying the refunding of the debt. It is still to the patent advantage of the Haitian Government to refund the debt by borrowing in dollars and paying in francs, when the francs are worth not 5 for a dollar, as formerly, but 10 for a dollar. Apart from this, in the opinion of your committee, it is of primary importance that the proposed loan should be made without delay, partly because it will afford a sum of money necessary to finish certain public works including the highway to Jacmel and that from Las Cahobas to Hinche, but also because under the proposed terms of the loan the debt will be a general charge upon the revenues of the country, and those revenues which are now specifically and irrevocably hypothecated to the service of certain loans will be freed from such rigid hypothecation and the onerous and inequitable revenue system of the country can be revised. There is appended to this report a table showing the contractual charges upon revenues in Haiti. A student of the Haitian financial system will be struck first by the charges upon exports (indirect and direct) and especially by the fact that they bear very heavily upon the poorest element of the population. If the debt be refunded as proposed, the revenue system can be revised and at one and the same time the burden upon the poor can be lightened and the export trade can be freed of uneconomic taxes.

It may be added that the new refunding loan, if consummated, will be made upon better terms than those recently made in the American market by European and South American governments.

As the negotiations for the revision of the charter of the national bank are all but consummated the committee thinks it unnecessary to dwell upon the matter further than to say that due to the insistence of the American State Department and of the vigilant financial adviser the terms of the new charter are more advantageous to Haiti than those of the old, and that already an end has been put to the fluctuation of the currency, in which foreign merchants and exporters speculated to their own advantage and to the injury of the Haitian peasant. It is because of this last that certain foreign financial interests—that is, interests neither American nor Haitian—have covertly, persistently, and perhaps corruptly, opposed the determination of the new bank charter and the stabilization of the currency.

As was indicated earlier in the report, when the American naval forces were landed in Haiti in 1915 the fine highway system left by the French had disappeared. In 1917 the commander of the occupation, in collaboration with the Haitian Government, invoked the Haitian law requiring the inhabitants to work upon the highways. This was the forced labor or corvee upon the roads. The law requiring the inhabitants to maintain roads was in principle not unlike some of the highway statutes of our own States. It had not been enforced for decades when, at the instance of the American naval command in Haiti, the Haitian Government invoked it in July, 1916. At first this step appears to have met with no opposition from the natives. On the contrary, under the tactful management of the gendarmerie command at that time, encouraged and stimulated by the enthusiasm of the American officers, they were eager to open a highway from the north to the south of the country. It is the almost unbelievable truth that with the decay of the French roads it was impossible for a vehicle to traverse any section of the roadless Republic. People worked with great good will upon those sections of the highway near which they dwelt. It was only after a year or more, when the gendarmerie command unwisely compelled natives to leave the neighborhoods in which they lived in order to complete the roads through the mountains, that discontent and dissatisfaction were first manifest. It is impossible to say in what measure the corvee contributed to the armed outbreak in the north. Almost all Haitian revolutions have had their beginning in the broken country lying between Cape Haitien and the Dominican border. Here the Cacos had lived for generations, and hence they marched to make their periodical attacks upon the capital as followers of one or another revolutionary chieftain. At all events, when the road law had been invoked for nearly two years, and when its enforcement had given rise to discontent, for the reasons indicated, Charlemagne Peralte, an escaped prisoner, raised a band of Cacos in the north, which for some 15 or 18 months carried on a formidable guerilla war against the native gendarmerie and the American Marine Corps.

CHARGES OF MILITARY ABUSES.

The accusations of cruelty which have been made against members of the Marine Corps have deeply concerned your committee and required its full consideration. If cruelty toward the inhabitants has been countenanced or has escaped the punishment which vigilance could impose, or on the other hand, if false or groundless accusations have been made, if facts have been distorted, the true conditions should be revealed. Your committee has realized the gravity of the charges and the importance of impartial investigation and it has allotted a full portion of its time to the investigation of these complaints made by or on behalf of the Haitians. Examination has been made of the records and methods of investigations conducted by the Navy Department. Many witnesses have been heard in this country and in Haiti, and some scores of affidavits read and considered. So far as time permitted no one was refused a hearing and no limit has so far been placed on the number of written complaints in affidavit form.

Much evidence does not appear in the record. This consists of oral statements made to the committee or to one or more members in the course of confidential conversations which took place during the committee's visit to Haiti. If those individuals who made the statements had not received and relied on the assurance that their names would not be published, nothing could have been learned from these valuable sources. Among those thus speaking in confidence were Haitians of education and influence, Haitians in positions of great importance, as well as others in subordinate positions and Haitian peasants, Americans engaged in business enterprise and other foreigners engaged in business or in philanthropic or educational work. If it had become known that any of these individuals expressed to the committee views contrary to the then organized opposition to the American occupation and its continuance, that individual would at once be marked for punishment. The consequences to the individual during the continuance of the occupation might have been financially and socially hurtful; and if the occupation were to be withdrawn, that person who had said anything in its favor would be in danger of persecution or loss of his life. These people who talked to the committee or its members did not know for how long they would receive the protection of the occupation. Those whose views they opposed included an influential group who would, temporarily at least, dominate the country if the occupation were to be withdrawn in the near future.

The committee has weighed this undisclosed evidence and has tried to give it its correct weight, but the committee can not in justice to the individuals disclose their names. One of those who spoke most impressively and whose opinion was entitled to great weight on account of long residence and close sympathy with the Haitians said:

"If the Government of the United States was to order the marines to quit the island, the last of them would scarcely be out of sight of land until a shot would be fired and then a revolution."

This opinion differently expressed is widely shared by responsible people in Haiti. Such can not express their opinions publicly at the present time, but no correct estimate of the situation can be reached without their opinions. The report of Professor Kelsey to the American Academy of Political Science, published in the committee's record, shows that he had an experience similar to that of the committee. We commend Professor Kelsey's report to the close study of those who are interested in the Haitian problem.

During the five and one-half years of the occupation 8,000 individuals have served in an average force of 2,000 marines stationed in Haiti since the occupation. It is true that some few of these individuals have committed crimes affecting the Haitians, the offenses depending in no way on the military character of the guilty parties. The very small number of such individual crimes reflects credit on the discipline of the Marine Corps. Proper diligence has been exercised by our military authorities in prosecuting and punishing the criminals. There has, however, been a different class of accusations—charges of violence committed by American marines or by the gendarmerie (the Haitian police force organized under the direction of the Marine Corps) and these charges contain elements of military oppression or unnecessary severity and reckless cruelty. These have formed one of the principal fields for investigation by your committee.

With few exceptions there are no complaints of such military abuses in the years 1915, 1916, 1917, and the earlier part of 1918. Nor are there many such complaints for the latter part of 1919 or the early part of 1920. All the charges concern times and places coincident with the phase of organized banditry or "Caco" outbreak which became serious in 1918 and was practically suppressed by the end of 1919. The charges of military abuses are generally limited to a somewhat restricted region in the interior of Haiti, namely, the central plain of St. Michel, in which are the communes of Maissade and Hinche, the mountains surrounding this plain, and the mountainous region surrounding the town of Mirebalais. This country is broken and wooded, thinly settled, and very difficult of access. Both areas are cut up by tangled ravines and barricaded by a confusion of small mountain ranges. Torrential streams add to the difficulties of travel. For years this has been habitually a revolutionary area and has been subjected for a generation to frequent destructive operations of irregular revolutionary forces or bandits. The male inhabitants of the region, if not in active sympathy with any of these revolutionary forces, were frequently forced to join them through fear. Peaceful agriculture was next to impossible, and the result was that a great majority of the inhabitants were lawless and in sympathy with the "Cacos," as the revolutionary bandits were called. The recruiting ground for revolutionary expeditions had always been the central plain and the mountains to the north, along the Dominican border.

THE "CACO" OUTBREAK.

The causes of the outbreak of lawlessness above referred to are not altogether clear. The principal instigator was one Charlemagne Peralte. He had been a leader or chief of the Cacos in the mountains of the north. He was a man of local prominence and had held absolute sway over his followers. His career had been "revolutionary," but he caused no trouble during the quiet years after the occupation until in the autumn of 1917, when he and some of his followers took part in an armed attempt at Hinche to rob the house of Captain Doxey of some public funds which had been received for disbursement. Charlemagne was arrested and convicted by a provost court and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. He was made to labor in the streets of Cape Haitien under guard like any other convict, and this aroused his intense bitterness against the Americans. He escaped in 1918 and began the outbreak in July, 1918, with a few of his old followers. His resentment was demonstrated by acts of violence alike against natives and Americans. He rapidly recruited followers from the former professional and habitual revolutionists, and other chiefs, following his example, came from retirement and recruited bands of their own. The outbreak was as much one of organized banditry as it was revolutionary, although there remained much resentment against the Americans among the former revolutionaries. There was resentment also against the continuance of the corvee, and this resentment undoubtedly made recruitment more easy for the bandit leaders. As in former days, also, the leaders pressed other inhabitants into their service.

The guerrilla outbreak was opposed, first of all, by the gendarmerie, which was recruited principally from the same class of population as the bandits and officered by the United States marines holding commissions in the gendarmerie, but by March, 1919, it became clear that the gendarmerie could not suppress the outlawry without assistance, and thereupon the Marine Corps took over the greater part of the burden, although the gendarmerie remained in active service. The enemy knew their country perfectly. When arms were not in their hands they could not be distinguished at sight from other inhabitants. The transformation from peasant to bandit and vice versa could be made at an instant's warning. There was reason to suspect almost any male adult of being from time to time engaged in active lawlessness and habituated to guerrilla warfare.

The problem was to restore peace and order in this central and northern mountainous region. The situation did not admit of effective operations carried on by larger bodies than a platoon or two. The only practicable method was the one adopted—that of constant patrolling by parties ranging in number from 4 or 5 men to 30 or 40 men. These small patrols were almost always vastly outnumbered. They endured tremendous physical hardships. They were frequently beyond the reach of help and were even out of all communication with other friendly forces for two or three weeks at a time. They ran risks and faced dangers such as are endured by beleaguered garrisons. It is impossible to judge of the accusations which have been made or of the conduct of the marines or gendarmerie as if they had been engaged on police patrols in a settled country intersected by highways.

Each patrol was necessarily commanded by an American. At that time if a patrol of gendarmerie were intrusted to a Haitian sergeant it was not effective against the bandits, and in default of disciplined command it might constitute a menace to the inhabitants. There were not enough commissioned officers of the Marine Corps available to supply commanders of all these patrols. Many of them were commanded by sergeants, corporals, or even privates of the Marine Corps who were commissioned as captains or lieutenants in the gendarmerie. To the credit of our country nearly all of these men performed their duties admirably. Their courage sustained them in the face of danger and hardship, and their common sense and justice slowly won the confidence of the inhabitants. There were, however, some few exceptions who failed in their duty. Among these few were commissioned as well as noncommissioned officers of the Marine Corps. It is against these patrol commanders that the charges of military abuses are made.

The uprising was subdued by these patrols. With greater endurance and determination than the bandits, they kept constantly on the move. For months there were skirmishes and marches, and the bandits were kept constantly on the run. Many of the bandits took advantage of invitations to surrender. Those who did so were disarmed and were given a safe-conduct card; but some persisted. As long as a single hostile band was in the field the work remained unfinished. The leaders of the bandits knew and sometimes even were on friendly terms with the "notables" or leading men of these remote sections. As the campaign progressed the marines won the approval of the humble inhabitants, but they increased the dislike and resentment of those notables who were cacos or were allied with them. The committee has found that most of the accusations are made against a small handful of marines. Some of these were most active and effective against the bandits. Some of the accusations first brought against them have been entirely disproved, and yet other accusations spring up against them. In such cases it is at least possible that they are the victims of slander inspired by the intelligent hatred of the small native leaders whose dominance they destroyed.

The campaign continued through the year 1919. The enemy bands frequently numbered as many as three or four hundred, although their personnel undoubtedly was constantly changing. By constant pursuit and by attacking on sight regardless of the disparity of numbers, the Americans or the gendarmerie, under the American command, gradually wore these bands down until they disappeared. The pursuit and the fighting occurred in the wilderness, and it is hard to imagine and impossible to describe the hardships constantly endured by our men. The pursuit under the conditions we have described must have seemed endless, although surrenders and casualties and fatigue were constantly reducing the numbers of the Cacos. It is impossible to give the exact number of engagements, but it is accurate to say that in one place or another armed encounters occurred daily. Late in 1919 Charlemagne was killed in the field. This broke the back of the uprising, but another principal leader, Benoit, remained in bush for several months until he also was killed, in May, 1920. After his death the last of the disorder was quickly put down.

During all these times at least three-fourths of the territory of Haiti and four-fifths of the inhabitants were not directly affected. The remaining one-fourth of the territory to which this discussion refers, containing the lawless population, was the theater of practically all military operations, and was the only source of complaints of military abuses.

PEACE ESTABLISHED.

These regions are now peaceful. There are no bandits in Haiti. The inhabitants are leaving the mountain forests to cultivate the central plain—less disturbed than they have been within the memory of living man. It is impossible to determine in exact figures the number of Haitians killed in this 18 months' guerrilla campaign. A fair estimate is about 1,500. The figure includes many reports based on guesses made during combat and not on actual count. The casualties, whatever they were, undoubtedly included some noncombatants. The bandits were found resting in settlements, where they were surrounded by their women and children, or in villages where they camped and were tolerated by the inhabitants through fear or friendship. When encountered they had to be instantly attacked. These conditions largely account for the deaths of the bystanders.

Such casualties are to be deplored. They were unhappy consequences of the irregular operations. Your committee is convinced that the suppression of the bandits by patrols was the only method which would have been effective. It is fair to speculate that if the bandits had been permitted to continue their depredations there would have been a greater number of innocent people killed and a far greater sum total of misery. During this outbreak the bandits preyed on the other inhabitants, robbed them, maltreated them, and burned their houses and crops, as they had been wont to do in the many revolutions before the occupation. The peasants who were the victims do not now wish for the withdrawal of the marines. To-day they may work and travel without fear of robbery. Of this the committee has been convinced by opinions expressed at first hand by intelligent peasants. These are jealous of their sovereignty, but have every reason to be and are aware of the benefits of peace and order, and their first wish is that peace and order by some means may be assured.

The committee is convinced that cruelty has never been countenanced by the Navy Department or by the brigade commanders of our marines in Haiti or the commandants of the gendarmerie of Haiti, nor has this been alleged to the committee.

It is evident to anyone who reads the testimony of a number of witnesses that some false and groundless charges have been made and that in many cases facts have been distorted and exaggerated. Fairness compels the further explanation that few, if any, of the illiterate and ignorant peasants making such charges knew the difference between what they had seen and what they heard said at second or third hand or on sheer rumor. Utterly untaught in justice or evidence, they have probably been induced in some cases to bear false witness. Whether these charges be described as false or mistaken, it would be wrong to judge those who made them by American standards. Nevertheless, the testimony of such witnesses is dangerous unless it is carefully sifted. An illustration will show this:

In September, 1920, five Haitian gendarmes stated under oath that Lieut. Freeman Lang, of the gendarmerie, had in the early part of November, 1918, at Hinche shot a prisoner. One other said he saw Lang shoot two prisoners. One other said he had seen Lang shoot five prisoners at different times in October and November, 1918. All, however, told of the death of one particular prisoner. They all said the single prisoner had been led from jail and that he had talked with Lang and had then been killed by Lang at a distance of 10 to 20 paces with a machine gun or automatic rifle. Two added that Lang told the man he was released and could go home. Some said the man refused to give information and was therefore shot. According to the testimony of each of these witnesses, it was a cold-blooded and treacherous killing. All said they had seen it done.

In November, 1920, five of these same witnesses also testified before the Mayo court of inquiry. On the latter occasion the witness who had said that Lang killed two prisoners testified that only one man was killed and that he was walking away. Another witness at the later hearing said that the prisoner was walking, then that he was running and trying to escape. His first version had been that Lang had told the prisoner he could go home. Another of these witnesses, the one who said he had seen Lang take five from prison and shoot them because they would not talk could not at the second hearing say whether the prisoners were running or not when they were shot and that in two of the cases he did not see the shot fired. He also gave a different place for one of the shootings in his later testimony. There were no prisoners missing from the prison at Hinche at those times. In their later testimony two witnesses made the date precise, November 4, but one could not tell the year. One who first testified he saw Lang shoot the prisoner later said he did not see Lang shoot the prisoner, only saw the prisoners dead after hearing the shots. Another first testified that Lang told the prisoner he could go home, and said two months later he was a long way off and could hear nothing that was said. Lang's version, fully substantiated by Daggette, another marine eyewitness, was that the prisoner, a Caco leader just captured, was taken under guard from prison to Lang's house to be questioned. He refused to talk and was led back under guard toward the jail. Lang at the same time had walked a considerable way toward his office in another building when he heard the guard fire two or three shots and saw the prisoner running toward some woods across the square. The guard was missing his shots and it was dusk.

Lang ran back 30 or 40 yards to his house, where there was an automatic rifle kept set up on the veranda, loaded and cocked. He fired in order to prevent his escape; one shot burst and brought the running man down dead at a distance of 150 yards. He at once reported the incident to his superior officer. A circumstance which discredits the Haitian witnesses is that an automatic rifle is too heavy a weapon to hold comfortably while standing up to cross-question a witness or to have overlooked while assuring a prisoner he could walk away with safety. At any rate the Mayo court exonerated Lang completely of this charge and likewise exonerated him on other charges brought against him by the same kind of witnesses, charges that circumstances and positive testimony proved impossible. These charges were probably inspired.

A reading of the testimony referred to in the Mayo court record will certainly raise that suspicion. (See Exhibit 5 attached to record of Mayo court and testimony before that court of Toussaint, Monfiston, Brave, Jean, Rouchon, Lang, and Daggette.)

The committee itself has heard Haitian witnesses declare they had seen certain acts and describe them in detail, and then after some questioning—entirely kindly—say they had been one-half mile or more away or in another part of the country and had only heard about it soon afterwards or much later.

A witness named Polidor St. Pierre testified before the committee at Port au Prince that he had been tortured in the prison St. Marc in January, 1919, and that the American marine captain whom he named had been personally present and directed the tortures. The witness said that the captain had caused him to be put in irons and hung up by a rope attached to his handcuffs and passed over a rafter in a prison cell. He said he thus passed five days without eating or drinking. The witness next testified that the next morning after the witness entered the prison the captain caused water to be boiled and poured down the witness's throat. The actual operation was performed by four gendarmes, the captain being present.

The witness said that two days afterwards the captain himself applied a hot iron to various parts of the witness's body, and that later he received medical treatment from the captain and a surgeon. The witness said that another Haitian prisoner named Medelus Valet was present and saw these occurrences, and that this same Valet was at the time of the committee's hearing imprisoned at Port au Prince. The committee caused Medelus Valet to be brought before it and sworn. Before this time neither the committee nor its counsel had opportunity to communicate in any way with Valet, and had no intimation as to what his testimony would be. Valet said that St. Pierre was tortured; that he had been hung up on three different occasions about one-half hour each by a rope attached to his handcuff; that he had not had water poured down his throat but that he had been branded. Valet said that this was all done by Haitian detectives and gendarmes in the absence of the captain, and that the captain became very angry when he learned of the mistreatment. He took St. Pierre out of the cell, put him in the prison sergeant's room, and had a surgeon treat him three times a day. (Reference: Testimony of St. Pierre, record, pp. 857–865; testimony of Valet, record, pp. 883–885.) These illustrations are not exceptional but usual, both in untruthfulness of testimony and in the suspicion of subornation.

ILLEGAL EXECUTIONS.

On the other hand, certain instances of unauthorized executions of captives at the hands of marines or at their command are beyond much doubt established. The number is small. In fact, after full inquiry and earnest invitation to complainants to come forward as witnesses or with affidavits, the committee is to this day reasonably satisfied of the fact of 10 such cases, of which 2 have been established in the course of judicial inquiries. Those who were killed had been caught bearing arms and had been imprisoned. These illegal killings all took place within the period of six months from December, 1918, to May, 1919, and all happened in one of the two areas in the remote interior. Of the three Americans who, as officers, would be directly responsible if the facts were judicially established, one (1) was insane, one (2) dead, and the other (3), commissioned in the gendarmerie from the enlisted personnel of the marines, has been discharged from the service. These three cases call for special mention:

(1) The evidence as to this case is found in the court-martial records of Privates Johnson and McQuilkin and on pages 737 to 741 of the committee's record. The American gendarme lieutenant in question was a private in the Marine Corps, commissioned as lieutenant in the gendarmerie. The two privates, Johnson and McQuilkin, were court-martialed because they were members of a firing squad which illegally executed two Caco prisoners in May, 1919, at Croix des Bouquets, in the region of Mirebelais. The evidence is clear that these executions were ordered and superintended by the American lieutenant of gendarmerie. In the testimony it also appeared as undisputed that these same men had been present at the execution of still one more Haitian prisoner five days earlier, also under the orders of the same lieutenant. There is no doubt but that those who were executed had already been taken prisoners and were shot without trial. The lieutenant who directed the executions was not court-martialed because he was found to be insane. His mental condition was observed at Port au Prince in July, 1919, at the naval hospital, Charleston, S. C., in September, 1919, and the naval hospital, Washington, D. C., in October, 1919, and in all cases the diagnosis was dementia precox.

The court-martial of the two privates was upon charges preferrtd June 22, 1919, one month after the executions of the Haitian prisoners. It was these two court-martial cases which upon being reviewed by General Barnett, as commandant of the Marine Corps, caused him to write a letter to Colonel Russell, then brigade commander, in which the general uses the expression "practically indiscriminate killings" by marines of natives. General Barnett testified before the committee (record, p. 439) that these two court-martial cases formed the only basis for his allegation. While there can be no excuse for the killing of these three Haitians, there could have been no legal conviction of the lieutenant of gendarmerie, who was insane.

(2) Reference in this instance is made to the testimony of Mr. Spear, formerly a lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps, which appears in the committee's record, pages 583 to 592, and also to the record, pages 646 to 647. Mr. Spear, now an attorney practicing in Nebraska, had enlisted in the Marine Corps and had been promoted to a lieutenancy. While holding this rank he saw service in Haiti. In May, 1919, he was second in command of a detachment of marines near Mirebelais. This detachment was relieved by another, the commander of which turned over two Haitian prisoners to the commander of Spear's detachment. The commander of Spear's detachment understood that these prisoners were turned over to him with orders to kill one of them.

One of them was shot by the orders of the commander of Spear's detachment. There were no Haitian prisoners at that time under sentence of death, and this alleged execution would therefore necessarily be illegal. The detachment commander who directed this execution was killed in an airplane accident in August, 1920. The committee finds no reason to doubt the truth of Mr. Spear's testimony; and although the death of this unknown Haitian can not be regarded as legally established, the occurrence can not here go unmentioned. It apparently did not become known to officers in higher command. There is nothing to show that Lieutenant Spear was in any way responsible for the death of this Haitian. There can be no justification for the execution of the prisoner if, in fact, it took place.

(3) In this case the American in question was, as captain in the gendarmerie, in direct military control of a relatively small territorial subdivision. The locality was, however, one of importance, because it was a trouble center for bandits. From time to time prisoners were taken in armed encounters or arrested as bandits. This man admitted to the brigade commander, Brigadier General Catlin, and to the commandant of the gendarmerie that he had caused the execution without trial of six prisoners led from jail.

The question of a court-martial on a charge of murder was resolved in favor of the offender by the brigade commander, because the proof of guilt consisted of the confession, and the confession required corroboration. Such was the quality of the other evidence available that the brigade commander doubted whether it would be sufficient in law. He testified before the committee that an acquittal would have had a bad effect on the natives, who would have called the trial a whitewash, while a conviction in a place far away could never have any effect one way or the other with the inhabitants. He decided not to risk an acquittal, and without court-martial removed the man from command and service in the gendarmerie. The man, soon afterwards discharged from the Marine Corps, has disappeared. If apprehended he might be surrendered to Haiti at the request of that Government, but the legality of such surrender would be at least doubtful. Whether at this late date a conviction for murder on the testimony of the ignorant and irresponsible native witness from the locality would be possible or just the committee as a nonjudicial body can not decide. It feels, however, that there might be a reasonable doubt. In the judgment of the committee, there must have been some tangible ground for trial and punishment, if not for murder, at least for a lesser offense against discipline. The committee is astonished that a man without sufficient experience or established character should have been placed in authority in a troubled district. (See General Catlin's testimony, record, pp. 660–662. General Catlin's statement, Exhibit 5, Mayo court record, Lieut. Col. A. S. Williams's testimony, record, pp. 549–550.)

The committee has heard a number of complaints of the burning of houses of innocent inhabitants by the marines. The witnesses or affiants do not allege nor do they deny that there were Cacos or bandits actually there at the time of the burning. The times and places alleged in all cases seem, however, to indicate that the houses burned were palm or wattle huts in settlements infested by bandits. The bandits were either there or near by in camps or were resting in the guise of innocent inhabitants, and the huts were burned by patrols. In some cases this was undoubtedly a necessary military measure. It is also quite possible that some habitations were burned without substantial justification on this ground, but the committee has not learned of any that were burned at places and times where and when there were not grounds to suspect that they were used as shelter for the enemy.

CHARGES OF TORTURE.

Accusations have been made of tortures and cruel beatings. Many of these accusations have been completely refuted; others bear a resemblance to types of cruelty well known in Haiti for many years but foreign to anything known in America. Americans are not given to mutilating their dead enemies. A charge of mutilation against an American at once suggests a very close scrutiny of everything the witness says. Mutilations probably did occur. They may have been inflicted by the bandits or by the gendarmerie in the absence of white officers or conceivably by white officers, but the character of the testimony leaves a grave doubt as to the identity of the criminals. The committee is convinced that these cruel or inhuman acts were probably never committed by Americans.

Maj. Clarke H. Wells, of the United States Marine Corps, was a colonel in the gendarmerie and in command of the Northern Department of Haiti in the last months of 1918 and until March, 1919, when he was relieved by the then brigade commander, Brigadier General Catlin. The manner in which he performed his duty and the subsequent investigations of his conduct call for special comment by the committee. Conditions had gotten out of hand in his department, which embraced the trouble centers of Hinche and Maissade, and General Catlin, reaching that conclusion, relieved him. There had been a mutiny in a gendarmerie station. Specific accusations were made against Major Wells, and these accusations were examined in four later investigations. Court-martial charges of a serious nature were preferred against this officer and withdrawn without trial on account of insufficiency of evidence to substantiate the charges. He was in a position of high responsibility, and the consequences of any failure in duty or misconduct on his part would therefore have been great. The committee finds every evidence of sincere and energetic investigation of the charges against Major Wells, but it regrets that investigation was not instituted more promptly or rather at the time when he was relieved from command of the Northern Department. A board of investigation took up his case about six months after he was relieved from command. It is apparent that even then too much time had elapsed to arrive at the facts. The character of the testimony adverse to Major Wells does, in the opinion of the committee, raise such a doubt as to fault on his part as would make unjust any findings against him.

At the same time the present situation is unjust to the officer in question if he is blameless. Therefore the failure to go thoroughly into his conduct in March, 1919, is greatly to be regretted. The truth arrived at then would undoubtedly have cleared up incidentally many of the other accusations with which the committee has had to deal, because the greater part of the accusations arose in Major Wells's department during the time of his incumbency.

The specific accusations were:

(1) That he permitted a continuance of a modified form of corvée after all corvée had been prohibited. Actual knowledge of this on the part of Major Wells could not be proved, but at Hinche and Maissade there continued some work on the road which while not technically forced labor was being done at low wages by unwilling workmen. This caused serious trouble.

(2) That Major Wells directed the suppression of mention of trouble in reports to gendarmerie headquarters. Major Wells has denied this, but has stated that he did make an effort to suppress sensationalism in reports. The testimony is conflicting.

(3) That he gave directions to treat the Cacos with severity and that he discouraged the taking of prisoners. Some forms of this accusations are to the effect that he directed that prisoners be killed, and that this was understood to authorize the execution of prisoners already captured rather than the shooting at sight of armed bandits.

The testimony subsequently taken on all these points is contradictory and confusing, especially on the last point. Three gendarmerie officers were examined at least twice and the statements of each were very dissimilar on the different occasions. A number of officers with equal opportunities for observation were examined and their testimony was entirely negative. The testimony which was most damaging, if competent, was purely hearsay, and on being followed up was not substantiated. There are indications that the testimony of some of the officers examined after they had left the service was biased by prejudice. Other officers examined spoke very highly of Major Wells's administration.

The record as a whole discloses an earnest effort in September, 1919, by Major Turner, and in January, 1920, by Colonel Hooker and Major Turner, by the direction of the brigade commander, Colonel Russell, and in September, 1920, by Generals Lejeune and Butler, by the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and in October and thereafter in 1920 by the Mayo court of inquiry, to arrive at the facts. This committee wishes to express its regret that doubt still remains and its belief that more prompt investigations should have been made.

The committee is not a judicial body. It feels that it should make no report definitely accusing any individual of crime unless that individual has had a trial. The committee can not try individuals, nor can the committee continue indefinitely in existence. Since its visit to Haiti the committee has received a number of affidavits definitely accusing American officers of murder and extreme cruelty, mostly during the year 1919. The number of officers named is not large. During its visit to Haiti it heard testimony in which officers were accused and in which military abuses were attributed to unnamed American marines. Investigation of some of these cases has already been made and the committee has the reports. The committee has referred all other accusations for investigation by the Navy Department, requesting a report as to facts developed. It has admitted in evidence all the accusations. Time has not permitted due investigation of and report on the more recently received accusations. The committee proposes to print all accusations of a serious nature, but it proposes to reserve such publication until the results of investigation can be printed at the same time. In this way it feels it may demonstrate to the Haitians the willingness of America to receive and air all just complaints, but at the same time it will safeguard innocent and faithful American officers from revolting slander.

A SUMMARY OF THE FACTS.

On the evidence before it, the committee can now state—

(1) That the accusations of military abuses are limited in point of time to a few months, and in location to restricted areas.

(2) Very few of the many Americans who have served in Haiti are thus accused. The others have restored order and tranquillity under arduous conditions of service, and generally won the confidence of the inhabitants of the country with whom they came in touch.

(3) That certain Caco prisoners were executed without trial. Two such cases have been judicially determined. The evidence to which reference has been made shows eight more cases with sufficient clearness to allow them to be regarded without much doubt as having occurred. Lack of communications and the type of operations conducted by small patrols not in direct contact with superior authority in some cases prevented knowledge of such occurrences on the part of higher authority until it was too late for effective investigation. When reported, investigations were held with no apparent desire to shield any guilty party. Such executions were unauthorized and directly contrary to the policy of the brigade commanders.

(4) That tortures of Haitians by Americans has not in any case been established, but that some accusations may have a foundation in excesses committed by hostile natives or members of the gendarmerie without the knowledge of American officers. Mutilations have not been practiced by Americans.

(5) That in the course of the campaign certain inhabitants other than bandits were killed during operations against the outlaws, but that such killings were unavoidable, accidental, and not intentional.

(6) That there was a period of about six months at the beginning of the outbreak when the gendarmerie lost control of the situation and was not itself sufficiently controlled by its higher officers, with the result that subordinate officers in the field were left too much discretion as to methods of patrol and local administration, and that this state of affairs was not investigated promptly enough, but that it was remedied as soon as known to the brigade commander. That the type of operations necessarily required the exercise of much independent discretion by detachment commanders.

(7) That undue severity or reckless treatment of natives are never countenanced by the brigade or gendarmerie commanders and that the investigation by naval authority of charges against members of the Marine Corps displays no desire to shield any individual, but, on the contrary, an intention to get at the facts.

(8) That the testimony of most native witnesses is highly unreliable and must be closely scrutinized and that many unfounded accusations have been made. It is also felt that in the case of accusations of abuses committed two years ago now made for the first time the delay has not arisen through any well-grounded fear of oppression by military authority, but that many of those accusations in affidavit form now forthcoming are produced at this late date because it is thought by those who are agitating for the immediate termination of the occupation that such accusations will create in the United States a sentiment in favor of such termination. In such cases the delay in making the charges and in presenting the evidence weighs heavily against the truth of the charge. All such charges, however, require full investigation. The committee feels certain that the necessary investigation by the Navy Department will be thoroughly conducted, that the rights of those accused will be respected, and that there will be no suppression of facts. When collected, the facts so obtained may be weighed with the facts alleged in the accusation. If, when all such evidence is in, the committee has any reason to change any of its conclusions, it will submit with the evidence as printed such revision of this report on the alleged military abuses as may be required.

The committee believes that an important lesson may be learned from a study of the bandit campaign and the subsequent grave charges of misconduct. The lesson is the extreme importance in a campaign of this kind for higher command to require daily operation reports to be prepared by patrol leaders. In the early days of the outbreak such reports were not systematically required. Small patrols would be out of touch with the rest of our forces for days or weeks under distressing conditions of service. There is no complete record of the places they visited or when the visits were made or who was in command. If such reports or records were in existence, innocent individuals could instantly be cleared of unfounded charges and guilty individuals could be identified with certainty. Such reports would have been a safeguard to the inhabitants and to the reputation of the Americans.

AMERICAN EFFORT TO BLACKEN THE NAME OF THE NAVY.

In concluding this portion of the report the committee expresses its chagrin at the improper or criminal conduct of some few members of the Marine Corps and at the same time feels it to be its duty to condemn the process by which biased or interested individuals and committees and propagandists have seized on isolated instances or have adopted as true any rumor, however vile or baseless, in an effort to bring into general disrepute the whole American naval force in Haiti. The committee wishes to express its admiration for the manner in which our men accomplished their dangerous and delicate task.

Patrolling still goes on, although the country is peaceful. For the last two years or more daily reports have been required. It is noteworthy that in the last two years or more there have arisen no serious grounds for complaint.

The confidence placed in the Americans by the Haitian peasants and the approval frequently communicated to the committee by those who know and sympathize with the peasants and who are engaged in philanthropic or educational work among them negative the idea of any campaign of terrorism against the inhabitants, such as agitators and professional propagandists, Haitian and American, would have appear.

The acceptance of the status quo, the appreciation of the present peace and increasing prosperity of the country, by the mass of the people, is proven by the fact that there are among two and a half million people only twenty-five hundred gendarmes and less than twenty-five hundred marines.

A SUMMARY OF FAILURE AND ACHIEVEMENT.

It has been necessary to interrupt the general consideration of the American occupation in Haiti in order to review at length the incidents of the outbreak of 1918 and 1919. The committee is not prepared to say that the rising of Caco bands in the section of the country where for a generation revolution habitually originated was encouraged by the corvee. But it is impossible not to condemn the blunder committed when under the corvee laborers were carried beyond their vicinage to work under guard in strange surroundings. This was an error of commission like those of omission arising from failure to develop a definite and constructive policy under the treaty or to centralize in some degree responsibility for the conduct of American officers and officials serving in Haiti under the Government of Haiti or that of the United States. The blunder arose, too, from the failure of the departments in Washington to appreciate the importance of selecting for service in Haiti, whether in civil or military capacities, men who were sympathetic to the Haitians and able to maintain cordial personal and official relations with them.

It may be set down to the credit of the American occupation and the treaty officials that the Haitian cities, once foul and insanitary, are now clean, with well-kept and well-lighted streets. The greater part of an arterial highway system opening up the heart of the country has been built. The currency, which once violently fluctuated under the manipulations of European merchants, has been stabilized, to the great advantage of the Haitian peasant. Arrears of amortization as well as of interest on the public debt have been paid, as also are regularly paid the salaries of the smallest officials. The steamship communications between Haiti and the United States are greatly improved. Trade and revenues are increasing. The revision of the customs and internal taxes, so important to the prosperity of Haiti and especially of its poorest classes, awaits the funding of the debt by a new loan. There is peace and security of property and person throughout the Republic. The peasant in his hovel or on the road to market is safe from molestation by brigand or official authority. A force of 2,500 gendarmes, insufficiently trained to cope with the Caco outbreak in 1918, is now admirably disciplined. As its morale has improved, the force has become at once more considerate and more efficient in the discharge of its duties. It is noteworthy that an increasing proportion of the commissioned officers are native Haitians, those promoted from the ranks to be supplemented by others, graduates of the newly established cadet school. In brief, under the treaty the peace of the Republic, the solvency of its Government, and the security of its people have been established for the first time in many years.

WHAT MUST BE DONE.

Nevertheless your committee submits that the American people will not consider their duty under the treaty discharged if, in addition to what has been accomplished, there are not placed within the reach of the Haitian masses, justice, schools, and agricultural instruction. The treaty itself makes no provision to consummate these things necessary to be done for progress in Haiti. There ought to be appointed a legal adviser to the high commissioner. It would be an act of statesmanship and of comity on the part of our Government if it would send to Haiti a commission comprising a commercial adviser, an expert in tropical agriculture, and an educator of the standing and special experience of Doctor Moton, of Tuskegee. There ought to be a survey of the need and opportunity for industrial and especially of agricultural instruction and development in a country which depends upon agriculture as its sole source of wealth. Cuba is as exclusively an agricultural country as Haiti. Like Haiti it pays for its imports of manufactures by exports of tropical agricultural products. The per capita foreign trade of Cuba is from twenty to twenty-five times that of Haiti, and the per capita revenue greater in like proportion. Obviously, with continued peace and order, with the further building of highways and trails, with instruction in agriculture, the wealth, trade, and the revenues of Haiti will increase very greatly. Your committee submits that such an increase in wealth, commerce, and revenue is necessary to the social and political progress of the Haitian people. Although at this time a beginning may be made in the establishment of elementary schools throughout the country, primary education can not be made accessible to a majority of the children unless the wealth and revenue of the Republic are very much increased. As wealth and revenues increase, schools, trails, and highways may be extended, and as they are extended, in turn, the revenues will be further enhanced and so enable the further development of the public services. At the same time the buying power and the well-being of the people will increase as under American guidance or control they have so marvelously increased in Cuba and Porto Rico during the last generation. It is for this reason that your committee attaches importance to the dispatch of a commission such as suggested.

In this connection your committee believes it to be the duty of the American Government to advise the Haitian Government against permitting foreign interests to acquire great land holdings in Haiti.

Your committee would point out further that as communications are opened up and as the peasants are secure in their life and their property, and as each is able to earn something regularly from the sale of his little crop, the danger of revolution and banditry will diminish. It will be possible progressively to reduce the force of marines in the territory of the Republic and ultimately to intrust the maintenance of order and peace exclusively to the gendarmes. Your committee believes that a beginning in this direction may be made without further delay and that a concentration of the marine force may be begun and that the aggregate number of marines in the territory of the Republic may be reduced. It holds, however, that drastic reduction of the marine force, or its early withdrawal, would certainly be followed by a recurrence of brigandage and by the organization of revolutionary bands. The committee urges further that in connection with the concentration of the marine force in a limited number of posts, steps should be taken to put an end to the system of military law under which persons are tried in provost courts for offenses by the press against public order, or for attacks upon the military and peace forces within the Republic. These provost courts to-day do not touch the lives of the overwhelming majority of the people. It was doubtless necessary to establish such courts, but it is not consonant with our declared purposes under the treaty to continue them indefinitely. Their abolition is conditioned upon certain precedent steps, among them a reform of the courts of first instance. This last is urgent and important.

Along the lines suggested there can be a rapid development in Haiti, moral, social, political, and economic, provided always that American policy be marked by continuity and by the spirit of service. Not only have certain American officers and officials been chosen for service in Haiti who were unsuited to their task, but men have been transferred from responsible posts before they could very well have learned the duties to which they had been appointed. During the six years of the American occupation in Haiti there have been half a dozen chiefs of the Latin American Bureau, half a dozen commandants of the forces of occupation, half a dozen commanders of the Gendarmerie d'Haiti. The committee holds that the reforms proposed (and heretofore informally suggested to responsible officials) should be energetically carried out.

So much for an American policy of constructive service to be rendered by American officials. On the part of Haitian officials and the literate element of the Haitian people there must be cooperation with the American officials. Haitians must candidly realize the meaning of the unhappy events of the last 20 years and appreciate that in collaboration with America under the treaty Haiti can develop the wealth necessary to progress, provide for the general education of her people, and establish a more truly representative system of government than she has ever known. There are certain elements in Haiti which can balk and perhaps delay the rehabilitation of the country. They can not prevent it. They can do much to further it. The obvious duty of patriotic Haitians is to uphold their own Government in effectively cooperating with that of the United States under the treaty, and so hasten the day when Haiti may stand alone. The alternative to the course herein suggested is the immediate withdrawal of American support and the abandonment of the Haitian people to chronic revolution, anarchy, barbarism, and ruin.

Your committee deems it wise to defer the report upon the Dominican Republic in view of the negotiations happily to begin between the State Department and the Dominican leaders looking to the termination of the military government in Santo Domingo.

[1] The tax on coffee herein mentioned does not include the tax of $2.50 on sorted coffee, which produced approximately $87,500.

Reduction of debt of the Republic of Haiti from February 28, 1919, to February 28, 1922.

[Expressed in francs.]

Foreign debt of Republic of Haiti as of February 28, 1919:

Loan of 1875:
Capital	19,252,560.00
Interest arrears	3,529,636.00
		22,782,196.00
Loan of 1896:
Capital	37,638,500.00
Interest arrears	8,280,470.00
		45,918,970.00
Loan of 1910:
Capital	64,021,000.00
Interest arrears	11,641,858.54
		75,662,858.54
		144,364,024.54

Against these foreign loans, the following payments had been made up to February 28, 1922:

Loan of 1875:
Capital, paid in full	$19,252,560.00
Deferred interest, due Feb. 28, 1919	3,529,636.00
Loan of 1896:
Capital	11,300,000.00
Deferred interest, due Feb. 28, 1919	8,280,470.00
Loan of 1910:
Capital	2,926,500.00
Deferred interest, due Feb. 28, 1919	11,641,858.54
	[1] 56,931,024.54

From February 28, 1919, to February 28, 1922, the internal debts of the Republic of Haiti had increased $887,339.47, although the amount of $493,910.13 had been paid against them, which latter amount was made up as follows:

Cie. Haitien de Construction	$165,600.00
P. C. S. Railroad	75,000.00
Wharf company	28,000.00
Interest on bank loan (note)	225,310.13
	493,910.13

Therefore, the net reduction in the entire indebtedness is $5,92,7399.43, less $887,339.47, which leaves $5,105,399.96.

[1] Converted at 9.5 francs per $1, equals $5,992,739.43.

APPENDIX B.

LETTER FROM HON. ROBERT LANSING, FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE, TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HAITI AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1922.

Hon. MEDILL MCCORMICK,
Chairman Select Committee on Haiti and Santo Domingo,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Complying with your request for a statement from me regarding Haiti, I beg to submit the following as embodying the contemporary views of the State Department on the financial and political disorders in Haiti, which caused a critical state of affairs during the last days of July, 1915, and on the attitude of the German Government toward Haiti, because largely upon those two considerations were based the instructions of the State Department to the United States Legation in Haiti and, through the Navy Department, to the United States naval commander in Haitian waters. The events to which I shall refer in this statement were succeeded by the ratification of the present treaty between the United States and Haiti, which had for its objects the insurance of Haiti's future welfare upon a permanent basis of law and order and the prevention of foreign intervention in the future based on political and financial disorders in Haiti.

On July 30, 1915, the U. S. S. Connecticut came into the harbor of Port au Prince just as President Guillaume Sam was being murdered and his body mutilated by an infuriated mob. This was an act of vengeance for the massacre of some scores of prisoners in the prison at Port au Prince who were political opponents of Guillaume Sam's government. The crowds attending the funeral processions of these victims of tyranny turned from them in a frenzy, dragged Guillaume Sam from the asylum which he had sought in the French Legation, killed him, dismembered his body, and paraded through the streets exhibiting the ghastly fragments. Revolutionary forces were at the time in possession of other principal ports of the country and threatened to attack the city of Port au Prince. There was no government to preserve order in the city or in the country. On the contrary, there was anarchy and armed insurrection. Universal fear prevailed, while the lives of Haitians and foreigners alike were imperiled by the conditions which existed. The violation of the extraterritoriality of the French Legation indicated the ruthless lawlessness of the revolutionaries. In the circumstances the forces of the United States were landed as a matter of urgent necessity.

The murders and atrocities perpetrated marked the complete breakdown of Haitian institutions, the culmination of a process of disintegration which had been in progress for a generation or more. It was evident from the state of affairs that there remained no possibility of a civilized government functioning without external assistance. The limit of tolerance for such conditions, which menaced the lives and property of Americans and other foreigners, was finally reached when the French Legation was violated. The restoration of order and government in Haiti was as clearly the duty of the Government of the United States as was the landing of the marines. If the United States had not assumed the responsibility, some other power would. To permit such action by a European power would have been to abandon the principles of the Monroe doctrine. The United States had no alternative but to act, and to act with vigor.

The process of disintegration above referred to is a matter of common knowledge. It is enough to say that none of the many Haitian Governments immediately preceding that of Guillaume Sam was able to maintain itself against revolution. Those persons who were from time to time in power were irresponsible and arbitrary. The inhabitants were exploited and robbed. So insecure were they in their possessions and so frequently in danger of their lives that industry throughout the country was paralyzed. Foreign lives were not taken, but there was such recurrent apprehension of violence that few years passed without the necessity of United States ships appearing in Haitian waters. Cruisers of foreign powers often came on similar errands, and on occasions European sailors or marines had been landed. These conditions had become chronic, and they had, year after year, grown progressively worse. In June of 1915 a French cruiser had landed a force at Cape Haitien, and these were only withdrawn when American marines were landed to take their place. After the invasion of the French Legation France dispatched a cruiser to Port au Prince and landed a force, which guarded the legation for several weeks without objection on the part of the United States Government. It was manifest that the danger to foreign lives in Haiti, which was constantly increasing, made the possibility of European intervention more and more probable unless the United States acted.

A default in payments to European creditors presented another danger. Haitian foreign loans were held by Germans, French, and English, but not to any great extent by Americans. The foreign loans were secured by the customs revenues—thus a default would have given rise to the desire on the part of European Governments to seize the Haitian customhouses and administer the customs—a situation which, being of indefinite duration, would have caused serious political complications and been a grave menace to the peace of this hemisphere and to the immunity from European interference with American institutions. The finances of Haiti had been growing steadily weaker, and the ability to meet her obligations had ceased. Interest on the public debt of about $20,000,000 had been paid with creditable regularity, but it had become necessary to borrow from the National Bank of Haiti and to make local forced loans elsewhere in order to meet these interest payments, and the limit of the ability to borrow had been reached. Amortization of foreign loans were many years in arrears. Revolutions had greatly increased the internal and floating debt. Fiat paper money was being issued but not used and payment of salaries of public employees was suspended. For this state of affairs no temporary remedy could suffice. This financial situation need hardly be treated here in greater detail.

In this connection, however, there was a more critical state of affairs than has been generally known. I refer to the attitude of the Imperial German Government in connection with the political disorders and financial straits of Haiti and the pretexts for aggression thereby afforded. There was good reason to believe that in the years 1913 and 1914 Germany was ready to go to great lengths to secure the exclusive customs control of Haiti, and also to secure a coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas. It is this feature that I would particularly call to the attention of your committee.

The United States had no wish to obtain a naval coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas. The Navy Department had long since definitely determined that a station there was not desirable, but it was also perfectly clear that a coaling station directly or indirectly controlled by another power would be a menace to the position of the United States in the Caribbean Sea, to the security of the Panama Canal and, consequently, to the peace of this hemisphere. A privately owned coaling station, whether in the hands of Americans or Europeans, would have been a danger if ever a coal supply was allowed to accumulate there greater than necessary for current commercial needs. In case of war the station and coal stored there would have been subject to capture. In view of the possible consequences the policy of the United States was clear. It could not look with favor on a privately owned coaling station at Mole St. Nicholas unless that was subject to its direct control. Though it did not need and it did not want such a station for itself, it could not permit a European Government to secure one. The indications were that Germany intended to obtain one unless she was prevented from doing so by the United States.

Although French is the official language of Haiti and French customs prevail as well as the practice of sending the children of wealthy Haitian families to France for their education, there has been, for many years, a strong German influence in the country resulting primarily from the establishment of German commercial houses at Haitian ports and the sending of young Germans to gain their livelihood in those concerns. A considerable number of these German residents have intermarried, so I have been informed, with the Haitians and are closely connected with and more or less active in the political and social life of the country.

During a number of years the Government at Washington was in receipt of various reports to the effect that foreign interests were desirous of obtaining coaling stations at Mole St. Nicholas, and in the year 1911 the Haitian Government at the insistance of the then American minister eliminated from a contract with a German national for a coastwise steamship service the granting of rights for a coaling station in Haiti.

In the year 1912 Hon. George von L. Meyer, then Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a communication from the Department of State in regard to the establishment of a coaling depot in Haiti for the steamship line of a foreign country, replied, referring to a communication made by the Navy Department to the State Department in 1910, to the effect that the Navy Department did not look with favor upon any proposition to establish so many coaling stations within such a limited geographical radius and could not contemplate favorably the prospect of having such stations in the hands of citizens of any of the European nations. The establishment of such stations would actually amount to the maintenance of a very considerable number of coaling stations close to our shores, which could be used by foreign vessels of war in the event of hostilities, and this, the Navy Department believed, should be prevented, if it were in the power of diplomacy to do so.

In the year 1913, and particularly in the year 1914, information was conveyed to the Department of State, through official and unofficial sources, to the effect that a German commercial firm was active in an attempt to secure extensive concessions from Haiti containing grants sufficiently broad to permit the building of coaling stations at Mole St. Nicholas, the concessions to be combined with a loan secured by control of the Haitian customs by the concessionaire. It was further stated that the German Government was back of the German commercial firm making the proposal.

On June 1, 1914, the American minister at Port au Prince reported to the Department of State that he was reliably informed that the Haitian Government would entertain a proposition to lease to the United States Mole St. Nicholas on the basis of a cash payment and a yearly rental. It was further stated that the Government of Haiti would most probably require, as an essential provision of such lease, that the United States should pledge itself not to interfere now or at any future time with the collection or administration of the customs of Haiti and would agree to afford protection to Haiti against any other nation or nations which might attempt to secure control of the customs. The minister concluded his telegram with the statement that the German cruiser Marietta had arrived the day before at Port au Prince.

As the United States was not interested in obtaining a lease of Mole St. Nicholas, no reply was sent to the minister's telegram.

Meanwhile, during the late winter and spring of 1914, financial conditions in Haiti, as a result of the political chaos existing, had been rapidly becoming more and more involved and foreign interests were increasingly anxious to obtain some form of guaranty from Haiti that that Government would continue to respect its obligations. As in most cases of this nature, suggestions were made relative to the collection and control of the Haitian customs by foreign nationals representing the foreign-debtor interests. The foreign interests referred to were the holders of shares in the National Railroad of Haiti and in the National Bank of Haiti, and also the holders of the bonds representing the Haitian external debt. It was also obvious that those interested in the national bank, which was controlled by French shareholders, were deeply concerned as to the ability of the Haitian Government to continue its existing financial policy on account of its outstanding loans.

Although various plans were discussed in the Department of State, which had as their object the aiding of Haiti and at the same time the protection of the interests of its creditors by means of a regulation of customs collections and their application, no agreement was reached between the Government of the United States and the Government of Haiti. However, under date of July 15, 1914, two weeks before the beginning of the World War, the American consul at Cape Haitien informed the department confidentially that he had learned from reliable source that the German minister at Port au Prince had telegraphed the German consul at Cape Haitien asking whether an American warship had landed its forces and taken possession of the customshouse.

On July 18, 1914, Mr. von Haniel, the chargé d'affaires of the Imperial German Government, spoke with the Third Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips, in relation to Haitian affairs, and on July 21 Mr. Phillips requested Mr. von Haniel to submit to him a written memorandum of the views of his Government which he had orally expressed. On July 25 Mr. von Haniel wrote to Mr. Phillips:

"MY DEAR MR. PHILLIPS: In reply to your favor of the 21st instant and with reference to our conversation of the 18th instant concerning the participation of the Imperial Government in a customs control in Haiti, in case such a control would be established by the American Government, I beg to say that my Government comprehends that the American Government, probably for reasons of interior politics, does not think it desirable if the most interested European powers participate in an eventual customs control in Haiti, but the Imperial Government as well has to take into account the public opinion in their country. Considering our economical interests in Haiti and the part of the Banque Nationale which is owned by Germans, people in Germany would not understand if my Government gave up their claim to participate in such a customs control. In the opinion of the Imperial Government, therefore, it will be the simplest solution if the status quo is maintained.

"I remain, my dear Mr. Phillips,

"Very sincerely yours, E. v. HANIEL."

Shortly following the delivery of the note of the German chargé d'affaires war broke out between Germany and France, and the communication was not replied to until September 16, 1914, when the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, wrote the following note to the German ambassador, Count von Bernstorff:

"MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Replying to the note of your Government's chargé dated July 15, 1914, regarding the matter of customs control in Haiti, I beg to say that the Government of the United States recognizes the large part which German merchants and German bankers have played in the development of the trade and enterprise of Haiti and wishes to make this correspondence the occasion for expressing the pleasure with which it witnesses the employment of German capital and the activity of German men of affairs in this hemisphere, but represents to the Government of his Imperial Majesty that German interests are not the only interests which have played a conspicuous and highly influential part in the development of the Haitian Republic and that the Government of the United States is well known to have taken for many years and without variation of policy and position that neither foreign influence nor interest proceeding from outside the American hemisphere could with the consent of the United States be so broadened or extended as to constitute a control, either wholly or in part, of the Government or administration of any independent American State.

"The Government of the United States can not depart from that policy and feels confident that the Government of his Imperial Majesty will not expect it to do so.

"Probably a participation of the Government of his Imperial Majesty in any method which might be agreed upon by which the Government of the Republic of Haiti should be assisted in the orderly, efficient, and economical administration of its customs revenues did not present itself to his Imperial Majesty's Government as a departure from the traditional policy of the Government of the United States when its note of July 25 was drafted. But this Government would regard such a participation as a very serious departure from that policy alike in principle and in practice. The Government of the United States regards it as one of the grave possibilities of certain sorts of concessions granted by governments in America to European financiers and contractors and of certain sorts of contracts entered into by those governments with European banking houses and financiers that the legitimate and natural course of enforcing claims might lead to measures which would imperil the political independence, or, at least, the complete political autonomy of the American States involved, and might issue in results which the Government of the United States has always regarded it as its duty to guard against as the nearest friend and natural champion of those States whenever they should need a friend and champion.

"Whatever the Government of the United States might deem it friendly and wise to agree to with the Government of the Republic of Haiti by way of assisting her to make good her obligations and escape the risks of default or disorder to her finances would be done without intending to serve the interest of any citizen of the United States in preference to the interest of the citizens or government of any other country. It would be planned for the benefit of all concerned and upon a basis of absolute neutrality. This Government does not regard its insistence upon an exclusive privilege in matters of this kind, therefore, as a course dictated by selfishness, but, on the contrary, as a course clearly dictated by a desire for peace and the exclusion of all occasion of unfriendliness with any nation of the other hemisphere. It is willing to give any pledges of disinterest and impartiality that may reasonably suggest themselves, but thinks that its best pledge is the course which it has, in fact, invariably pursued in matters and in circumstances of this kind. Its declared purpose in this case, should the Republic of Haiti desire a convention with regard to the administration of her customs revenues, would, as always, be made frankly and without reservation of any kind, and this it would deem the best evidence of its friendship and respect for the Government of Germany and the rights of German citizens wherever American influence may touch them. This is the way of peace and of mutual accommodation.

"Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

"W. J. BRYAN."

On the eve of the declaration of war between Germany and Russia the U. S. S. Connecticut and the German cruiser Karlsruhe were both in the harbor of Port au Prince. On July 31, 1914, the Karlsruhe changed her position in order to screen the movements of her crew and a number of boatloads of German sailors with small arms and machine guns left the Karlsruhe and proceeded to the wharf where they landed. When halfway down the wharf the Germans turned about, returned to their boats, and went back to their ship. This mysterious action took place at dusk. Shortly afterwards the captain of the Karlsruhe came aboard the Connecticut and told the captain he had received orders to proceed to St. Thomas for coal and asked the captain of the Connecticut to protect German interests while he was gone. The Karlsruhe then steamed out of the harbor to begin her commerce-destroying cruise. Shortly afterwards the captain of the Connecticut was informed by wireless that war between Russia and Germany had been declared.

There is reason to believe that the German landing party was turned back on the wharf by the German minister to Haiti pursuant to cabled orders for the Karlsruhe to leave Port au Prince at once. Thus the local situation was by the outbreak of the war relieved of a conflict of interests which might have caused serious embarrassment.

In the month of July, 1914, the Secretary of State sent a draft of a proposed agreement between the Government of the United States and the Government of Haiti to the American minister at Port au Prince. This agreement, which was modeled after the treaty entered into between the United States and the Dominican Republic during the administration of President Roosevelt, embodied the following provisions:

The appointment of a general receiver of customs and his assistants by the President of the United States; the payment of customs duties to the general receiver, and granting him all protection in the performance of his duties; the appointment of the financial adviser to the Government of Haiti; the application of all sums collected to the payment of interest and sinking fund of the public debt of Haiti; that the Republic of Haiti would not increase its public debt, except by previous agreement with the United States; that the United States should have authority to prevent any and all interferences with the receipt, collection, or free course of the customs, or with the free exercise of powers imposed upon the receivership.

However, a short time after the receipt of the proposed agreement by the minister a revolution broke out against the government of President Zamor, which, as usual in Haiti, started at Cape Haitien in the north and proceeded to Port au Prince via the town of St. Mark. It is interesting to observe in connection with the history of revolutions in Haiti that they have uniformly been conceived in or about Cape Haitien and have proceeded along practically the same roads in the direction of the capital, namely, by way of the strategic town of St. Mark. It has been the established belief of most Americans who have been in Haiti, and of American officials who have been cognizant of Haitian affairs during the past decade, that the majority of these revolutions have been financed in the north of Haiti by German merchants, who could expect sufficient financial advantages from the success of the revolution to warrant the initial outlay.

The revolution against the Zamor government was successful, and Davilmar Theodore proclaimed himself President of Haiti. The Government of the United States withheld its recognition of Theodore as President of Haiti pending an investigation of his activities and the incidents in connection with his seizure of the sovereign power. Before any definite policy in this connection was determined a revolution against the Theodore government was started in the usual manner and culminated in the overthrow of Davilmar Theodore and the assumption of the presidency by Guillaume Sam. The United States, consistent with its policy in regard to the recognition of revolutionary governments, refused to recognize the government of Sam, and not long after Sam had installed himself in the presidential palace another revolution, headed by one Doctor Bobo, broke out in the north. The resulting conditions alarmed the French minister, and in June, 1915, a French cruiser occupied Cape Haitien with a landing party, as has already been stated. Before the revolutionary forces had actually reached Port au Prince the massacre of political prisoners above referred to had taken place and Sam had been butchered.

During the terms of office of these Presidents various attempts were made on the part of the Government of the United States through special missions and through the minister in Port au Prince to obtain from these provisional governments an agreement as to the entrance into some form of convention between the United States and Haiti. The essential provisions of these conventions were, like the Dominican treaty, the guaranty by the United States of Haitian independence and of the stability of the Haitian Government, and the privilege of the United States minister to advise the Haitian Government in its selection of Haitian citizens as officials of the Haitian customs service, as the customs revenue was a prize which attracted revolutionists and their financial supporters.

On account of the state of the country during this period, in which violence and anarchy were rife, the overtures made by the United States, solely out of a sincere desire to aid the Haitian people to establish an orderly and law-enforcing Government, which would restore stable political and economic conditions in the island, were fruitless.

Admiral Caperton, of the United States Navy, who had arrived with his flagship in Port au Prince on the day of the assassination of Sam, landed a naval force of the United States and assumed military control of Port au Prince on July 30, 1915. The admiral and the American chargé immediately took steps to cooperate with the Haitian committee of safety for the protection of life and property in the city and adjacent country.

Various aspirants for election by the Assembly of Haiti for President presented themselves, among whom the most notable were Doctor Bobo and Senator Dartiguenave. The American representatives, under direction of the Government of the United States, discussed with these candidates and with members of the Haitian Congress the conditions upon which the United States would recognize a Government in Haiti. These conditions were as follows:

"First. Let Congress understand that the Government of the United States intends to uphold it, but that it can not recognize action which does not establish in charge of Haitian affairs those whose abilities and dispositions give assurances of putting an end to factional disorder.

"Second. In order that no misunderstanding can possibly occur after election it should be made perfectly clear to candidates, as soon as possible and in advance of their election, that the United States expects to be intrusted with the practical control of the customs and such financial control over the affairs of the Republic of Haiti as the United States may deem necessary for efficient administration.

"The Government of the United States considers it its duty to support a constitutional government. It means to assist in the establishment of such a government and to support it as long as necessity may require. It has no design upon the political or territorial integrity of Haiti. On the contrary, what has been done, as well as what will be done, is conceived in an effort to aid the people of Haiti in establishing a stable government and maintaining domestic peace throughout the Republic."

Congress elected Senator Dartiguenave President on August 12.

On August 14 the Department of State dispatched to the legation at Port au Prince instructions embodying the terms of a treaty to be negotiated, if possible, with the Government of Haiti.

On August 17 the chargé d'affaires of the United States, complying with the instructions received from the department, submitted to President Dartiguenave a draft of the proposed treaty. Negotiations with President Dartiguenave then proceeded. The President expressed his approval of the terms of the treaty, but for a month was unable to secure agreement on the part of his cabinet.

On September 15 the chargé d'affaires at Port au Prince reported to the department by telegraph that the Haitian Government had forwarded to the legation a copy of a formal protest addressed to it by the German minister, in which he stated that the American occupation and management of customs would be prejudicial to German interests. To this telegram the department replied that it would seem desirable that the Haitian Government should reply to the German minister to the effect that legitimate German interests would be accorded the same equitable and impartial treatment as would be given to all foreigners and foreign interests in Haiti.

On September 16 the treaty was signed, and on February 28, 1916, it was ratified by the Senate of the United States without a dissenting vote and without an amendment being offered. The principal provisions of this treaty were the guaranteeing of the independence of Haiti, the establishment of a native gendarmerie, the appointment of an American financial adviser, and the administration of the customs service by Americans.

It is especially to be noted in connection with those provisions of the treaty that the Government of the United States, although it had received a proposal from Haiti to cede to the United States outright without restriction Mole St. Nicholas, declined to insert such a provision in the treaty and insisted upon the inclusion in the treaty of an article expressly embodying the idea that no Haitian territory was to be ceded to it.

On September 17 President Dartiguenave's Government was accorded recognition by the United States.

The situation which confronted the representatives of the American civil and military forces in Haiti after the revolution and prior to the recognition of the Dartiguenave Government was briefly as follows:

The customhouses throughout the country had been disorganized by an order of the preceding Government which directed the deposit of funds with private firms instead of with the Banque Nationale, the legal depositary, and also by the threatened seizure of the customhouses by armed insurrectionary groups. The government of President Dartiguenave had not funds available to pay the small number of troops under its orders and these dissatisfied troops were becoming a menace to peace and order. The inhabitants of towns in which customhouses were situated were deprived of their food supply by the hostile armed bands which infested the highways, and even the water system of Cape Haitien was cut by these brigands. Commerce was paralyzed and the city populations were starving, for the authority of the Dartiguenave Government did not extend far beyond the outskirts of Port au Prince.

On August 19, in view of the serious conditions existing, which had been reported to the Government at Washington, Admiral Caperton received instructions to administer the customhouses so that the proceeds therefrom might be used temporarily to provide sustenance for the starving natives by paying them for labor on public works, to establish a gendarmerie to aid the Dartiguenave Government in the pacification of the country, and also to prevent the diversion of the public funds of the Haitian Government into the pockets of unscrupulous persons.

The customhouses were taken over between August 20 and September 2 as rapidly as the American squadron commander could place in charge of them American officers as administrators and could furnish them adequate protection. The customhouse at Port au Prince was the last to be taken over, on September 2. On September 3 the prevailing conditions of anarchy called for the proclamation of martial law. Thereafter, until the treaty was ratified by both countries, the customs were administered by the naval forces of the United States. After ratification the customhouses were taken over by the receiver general, a treaty official.

In October, 1915, attacks were made on parties of United States marines near Cape Haitien, and thereafter a sharp campaign was carried on against the lawless bands operating in the Republic which resulted in the restoration of order throughout the country. Many hundreds of the outlaws surrendered their arms, receiving a small sum for each rifle, and those who did not surrender were dispersed. With the restoration of order and the coming into effect of the treaty this period of the American occupation came to a close.

As may be concluded from the foregoing review of the circumstances leading up to the establishment of treaty relations between the United States and Haiti, the Government of the United States was animated by two dominating ideas:

1. To terminate the appalling conditions of anarchy, savagery, and oppression which had been prevalent in Haiti for decades, and to undertake the establishment of domestic peace in the Republic in order that the great bulk of the population, who had been downtrodden by dictators and the innocent victims of repeated revolutions, should enjoy a prosperity and an economic and industrial development to which every people of an American nation are entitled.

2. A desire to forestall any attempt by a foreign power to obtain a foothold on the territory of an American nation which, if a seizure of customs control by such a power had occurred, or if a grant of a coaling station or naval base had been obtained, would have most certainly been a menace to the peace of the Western Hemisphere and in flagrant defiance of the Monroe doctrine.

Very sincerely yours, ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the last sentence uttered by the Senator from Nevada constrains me to make one observation. I am sure the Senator does not mean to imply that other Senators have not advised themselves in regard to the question. I want to assure the Senator that I have read every page of the testimony. I have talked with scores of individuals who have visited Haiti, including a number of Haitians themselves. I was in Haiti a year and nine months ago for a short time only, however, and made inquiries there as best I could in regard to conditions and in regard to the control of the Haitian Government by American forces. I have read the report of the committee. I have had conferences with most of the members of the committee and know their views.

I think the Senator is in error in assuming, as his statement would seem to assume, a lack of information by the American people and by Senators in regard to the question. I concede that in its details perhaps a greatly overwhelming majority of the American people are not familiar with the occupation of Haiti and San Domingo.

But, Mr. President, my position is based upon the broad ground that the people of San Domingo and the people of Haiti have the right to determine their own form of government. It is not our island. It is not under the American flag. It is inhabited by people of a different race, who have a different culture and who have lived under different conditions from those prevailing in the United States. They did not invite us there. They do not want us there. It is their island, and the true government upon the island ought to be controlled by the people themselves.

If the right of self-determination has any justification in morals or in fact, now is the time to apply it. This Nation of ours, with all its power, notwithstanding its altruism and its benevolent intentions, ought not to subject an alien people such as these to the control of the Government of the United States. I concede for the argument, although I shall not enter into a discussion of it, that our occupation of Haiti and San Domingo might be of immense advantage to the people, might improve their health, might improve their morals, might improve them culturally and otherwise; but it is their country, their land, and they have a right to determine the kind of government they want.

For the same reason, I have been opposed to our keeping the Philippine Islands. I regard it as violative of the spirit of our institutions for the American Government to continue its authority over the Filipinos. We ought to get out of the Philippine Islands and let the people there organize the kind of a government they want. We ought to get out of Haiti and San Domingo and turn over to the people the territory and governments which belong to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. On page 56, line 13, I move that the words "when time and facilities permit" be stricken out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not speak for the committee in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and, of course, I do not know what view the conferees may take in regard to it, but personally I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment and letting it go to conference.

Mr. BROOKHART. Its adoption would leave the provision of the naval bill the same as that of the Army appropriation bill which was recently enacted into law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 56, line 13, after the words "United States," strike out the words "when time and facilities permit," so as to read:

And that no part of the moneys appropriated in each or any section of this act shall be used or expended for the purchase or acquirement of any article or articles that at the time of the proposed acquirement can be manufactured or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased or acquired otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington with respect to two items, one of which I have directed attention to heretofore, but the other I did not call to the Senator's attention. On page 29 I find the following provision:

Retainer pay and active service pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force class 1 (fleet naval reserve), $5,700,000.

Returning to page 13 and to the item heretofore considered in lines 19, 20, and 21 I find this provision:

And retainer pay of officers and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force, other than class 1, $3,800,000.

May I just make a brief statement as to my understanding of the two provisions? As it is constituted at present, the Naval Reserve consists of two classes: Class 1, fleet naval reserve, which consists largely of line officers and men who have resigned from the service; and, secondly, class 6, reserve officers and men who have voluntarily entered the naval service. The last class can be classified practically as a volunteer reserve. In the provision for pay of the Naval Reserve Force the two items to which I have referred can be found.

I would like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the first provision relates almost wholly to line officers; that is to say, if line officers would not be the beneficiaries almost entirely of the large appropriation found on page 13?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; that is not the case. It relates to both officers and men. The fleet reserve is composed of four classes:

Class 1a. Ex-officers, Navy, who have entirely severed their connection with the Navy and engaged in civilian pursuits, enrolled for four-year period, required to take drills and training cruises same as class 2 in order to draw pay of any kind.

Class 1b. Ex-men of the regular Navy of at least one four-year enrollment, who have entirely severed their connection with the Navy and engaged in civilian pursuits, enrolled for four-year period and required to take drills and training duty the same as class 2 in order to draw pay of any kind.

Class 1c. Men of the regular Navy of 15 or more years' experience, connection with Navy not severed but transferred direct to class 1c for indefinite period, not required to drill or train in order to draw retainer pay, receive one-third active-duty pay.

Class 1d. Same as class 1c, except members have had 20 years' active naval service and receive active-duty pay.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if the addition made in the Senate the other day of $900,000 will not go almost entirely to officers of the line—that is, to persons who have been in the line and who have separated themselves from the service and are in private life?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. The first item will go in part to officers of the line, as I have just stated. The other item to which the Senator refers would go to 1,500 officers and to 6,000 men of an entirely different class upon the basis of the regulations and requirements as to drills and training which in detail I pointed out to the Senator a few days ago.

Mr. KING. If I may further pursue the inquiry, the $900,000 which was added, if it remains in the bill, will be devoted almost exclusively to officers rather than to men, will it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the question I just answered, and I answer it again in the negative. It will not. It will go partly to officers and partly to men upon the ratio of 1,500 officers to 6,000 men.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator is right, but my information is just the reverse of that which has been announced by the Senator. May I inquire of the Senator with reference to the $5,700,000? None of this amount will be devoted, as I understand it, and I put it in the interrogative form, to the payment of either officers or men for any active service rendered?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I answer the question in the negative. I have just read to the Senator, and if the Senator will refer to the RECORD and the statements which I have just made to him, he will see that it is pay for services rendered—that is, if we consider active training in the Navy as service. The men are compelled to take the active training in order to be entitled to receive retainer pay.

Mr. KING. I again state that I hope the Senator is right, but my information is that none of those who will be the beneficiaries of the $5,700,000 will be required to render active service.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ought to qualify that statement, perhaps, although it is not necessary in view of the detailed statement I made a moment ago, by adding that classes C and D of the fleet naval reserve are composed of enlisted men of the Navy who have served in the one class 16 years in the Navy and in the other class 20 years in the Navy. They are entitled to retainer pay without performing active drill.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that the entire amount will be devoted to the payment of men who have separated themselves from the service and have gone back to private life, both officers and men; that there will be a large number of persons who were officers in the Navy who have separated themselves from the Navy and gone into private life, and who will get two months' base pay every year as long as they live if this provision should be continued in subsequent bills, and that it would give two months' pay without any service whatever to a large number of persons who have gone into private life, who had been in the Navy 15 years to 20 years and between those two periods. So that it amounts to a pension to both officers and men who have left the Navy and have gone out into private life. I think that upon examination the Senator will find it is true that this has been a method of pensioning officers and men who have left the Navy and gone into active private life. It is true that they are enrolled as members of the Naval Reserve or the Government regards them as appendages of the Navy, but they do nothing and they are not required to do anything except in the event of war; and in the case of war, for that matter, they could be called to the colors to aid their country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To what class of men is the Senator referring?

Mr. KING. I am referring to those covered by the appropriation of $5,700,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some of those are in the class which the Senator describes; that is, although this is the third time I have stated it, those, in the one instance, who have served 15 years and those, in the other instance, who have served 20 are not required to take training. The others are required to take training.

Mr. KING. I think the facts are that all who come under the appropriation to which I have referred have served 15 years or more.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Utah is mistaken about that.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Washington is in error. I think that the appropriation of $5,700,000 is provided for the purpose of paying a pension to persons, and in order not to call it a "pension" this adroit method has been employed. It is for the purpose of giving to a large number of officers who have gone into private life two months' pay and to give to individuals who have left the Navy and gone into private life two months' pay, although in neither instance are they rendering any service whatever to their country. That is my information.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator's information is not correct. The facts are as contained in the statement which I took the trouble to read into the RECORD and which I have repeated several times since. There is, however, a further observation which I should like to make in regard to the matter. Whatever the merits of the case may be, the Government is obligated under the law to make these payments. If the law is unjust or unwise, then the Senator from Utah or anybody else who thinks so ought to take steps to have it amended or repealed. Certainly the Government does not want to be in the position of refusing to pay the obligations which it assumed to the men who are entitled to payment under a law which has been enacted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that does not answer the situation at all. A provision is found in this bill to appropriate $5,700,000 for the coming year to a class of individuals who, according to my information, render no service whatever to the country. The fact of the matter is that when the war was over we had too many officers and too many men, and the Navy Department wanted to make provision for a large number of those persons whom it could not retain in the service; that is my information; and this plan was devised to give a pension to those who had been in the service for 15 years or 20 years, increasing the amount according to service, and provision has been made in several appropriation bills since to give to them what I have denominated as a pension, though they have returned to private life and are doing nothing whatever in a naval sense for the country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not want to protract the discussion; but I will say that if we were here considering the enactment of a law on that subject as to some of the classes in large part I would agree with the Senator; in other words, I think that the payments are overliberal. I vigorously opposed the enactment of the law, but it was fought out very intensely; my views did not prevail, and it is the law. So the only thing the Government can do is to appropriate the money to make the payments. However, only a small portion of these men are subject to that observation. The Senator makes the mistake of generalizing as to the entire Naval Reserve, mixing up the different classes and assuming that they are all subject to the charge which he has just made of receiving pay without rendering any service, which is not the case.

Mr. KING. I do not mix them up. Those who are embraced within the first appropriation found on page 13, unless those who will be paid out of the $1,000,000 which has been added may be excepted, will be required to do certain drill work and give 15 days' service during the year upon the sea; but my contention is that as to the last appropriation of $5,700,000 nothing is required to be done either by the officers or the men in order to avail themselves of the very liberal appropriation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why does the Senator keep on repeating that statement? He says that that is the case, and I say it is not the case. Both of our statements will have to be subject to anybody's correction who has any better information.

Mr. KING. Uudoubtedly. The Senator is entitled to his views and has received certain information, and I am entitled to my views based upon information which I have received, and I assert again that the information which I have received justifies the statement that substantially all of the $5,700,000 appropriation will be applied as a sort of pension to officers and men neither of whom will be required, in order to draw the pension, to render any service whatever, except in the event of war, in which case they would then take the status that would be occupied by the officers and men of the Navy who were admittedly within the service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are a few committee amendments which it is desired to offer for the purpose of clarifying the language of the bill. The amendments have been suggested by the Comptroller General. On page 3, line 15, after the word "mileage," I move to insert the words "and actual and necessary expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law."

Mr. KING. Will that amendment change the amount of the appropriation, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It will not; it will merely clarify the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 3, beginning in line 16, I move to strike out the words "in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers of the Navy and Naval Reserve Force while traveling abroad under orders."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if any of the appropriations in this bill may be expended for transporting officers or supplies of the Navy on foreign vessels?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I presume where it is necessary to use foreign vessels for transporting supplies, that is done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the question because the Senator will recall that we had the matter under discussion a few days ago in connection with the ship subsidy bill, when it was disclosed that a very large sum was annually paid out by the Government to cover the traveling expenses of officers and employees of the Government on foreign vessels. In the bill making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service an amendment was added providing that no part of the appropriations in the bill should be paid for the traveling expenses on foreign vessels of officers and agents of the department.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I may say to the Senator that in almost every case naval vessels are used for the transportation of naval supplies and for the transportation of naval officers and men. The travel pay in the provision now under discussion is for travel on land and not on the sea.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not been able to ascertain just where an amendment should be inserted limiting the appropriation for travel pay to transportation on American vessels. If I knew where such an amendment should be placed, I certainly would offer it. I understand that there is very little travel by officers or men of the Navy on foreign ships, but no naval officers ought to be allowed to travel at Government expense on other than American ships.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In case an American ship is available, of course that is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 10, line 19, I move to strike out the word "enrolled."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Does that change the status of anyone?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it does not. It merely makes the provision comply with existing law. I may repeat that all the amendments I am now offering are being offered on the initiative of the Comptroller General, who ultimately passes upon the effect of the language, and they are designed to meet his judgment as to making the provisions of the bill accord with existing law.

Mr. President, on page 29, line 7, after the word "pay," I move to insert the words "and allowances."

Mr. McKELLAR. What will that amendment involve? Will it not be equivalent to additional compensation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does not change the amount at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. It might change the amount considerably. The Senator will notice that the entire appropriation contained on lines 11 and 12 may be used for any purpose under the particular heading, and therefore the words proposed to be added might involve considerable additional pay and a considerable additional cost. All I want to know is what we are doing, so that we may vote intelligently.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certain allowances for quarters have been granted to members of the Naval Reserve Force of class 1 under the Army and Navy and other commissioned officers' pay bill which passed Congress a short time ago. The amendment is to make the pending bill comply with the terms of that law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 32, line 23, after the word "each," I move to insert the words "and for uniform gratuity to enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that amendment is acted upon I inquire whether its object is to extend the benefits of the act to other individuals or persons than those contemplated in the provisions now found in the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the contrary is the case. The amendment is offered in order to make the provisions of the bill comply with the terms of the existing law.

Mr. KING. Is it designed to confine it to the terms of the provision itself now in the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To correct an obvious clerical error I move, on page 46, line 18, after the word "active," to insert the word "list."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 46, line 19, after the word "pay," I move to insert the words "including uniform gratuity as authorized by law."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is the last amendment I have to offer, Mr. President: On page 47, line 23, after the word "mileage," I move to insert the following:

and actual and necessary expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have not an amendment prepared, but I want to suggest to the acting chairman of the committee that right after the figures "$125,000" there should be a proviso that this appropriation is made for travel pay for officers when traveling abroad on American ships only, unless a certificate is furnished by the Secretary of the Navy showing that the use of another ship is necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is only land travel. There is no mileage allowance for travel at sea. Marine officers always travel on naval vessels or else on Army transports. I am in entire sympathy with the Senator's object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course this appropriation would cover travel for officers anywhere. My information is that naval officers sent to any part of the world as observers usually select foreign vessels on which to travel; and it seems to me that the American Government ought to insist that its officers, no matter what department they are in, should travel on American vessels wherever they can be had.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator; but the effect of any such amendment would be to change existing law, and it would not be germane or appropriate at this point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; a limitation on an appropriation is always in order. It would not change existing law at all. There is no existing law requiring naval officers, or officers of any other department, to travel on foreign vessels. We just got into the habit, and we are spending very large sums of money for the purpose. The report presented here the other day showed that our officers uniformly selected vessels of other nations on which to travel abroad; and it seems to me that that would be the appropriate place to insert the amendment, right after the figures "$125,000." If the Senator will just let that pass for a moment, if he has anything else, I will prepare an amendment which I will offer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing more that I know of.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

On line 24, page 47, strike out the period after "$125,000" and insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended as travel pay for officers traveling abroad on foreign vessels, unless the necessity for such travel is duly certified by the Secretary of the Navy.

I hope the Senator will not object to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this applies simply to the Marine Corps.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have it apply not only to the Marine Corps but to the entire Navy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, while I think what the Senator proposes is the law now and I do not think it is necessary at all—of course, there is no travel allowed, certainly ostensibly at least, that is not necessary and approved by the department—in order to dispose of the matter, I will accept personally, as far as I am concerned, the amendment proposed by the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to state that some time during the morning hour on Wednesday I shall ask unanimous consent to call up and have passed the resolution that is on the table, that I introduced, providing for a special committee to investigate and report upon a revision of the Rules of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that House bill 12817, the unfinished business, may be laid before the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, adjourned until Wednesday, January 3, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 30, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We praise Thee, Almighty God, in the name of Him whose holy hand touched the foreheads of little children, the shadow of whose presence was a blessing to the outcasts and who is ever seeking to enfold in His teaching the sympathies of all men. Lingering with us is the mercy of Thy holy providence. We are grateful that no lasting calamity has befallen our national household. Over us has been the banner of divine care, and around about us have been the arms that never fail. Blessed Lord, as the volume of the old year is closing, mellow the thoughts of error and failure. O, may all embittering memories die as the door closes. Enable us to expel from our lives all sordid aims and carry forth into the future the sweetest hopes and the best ambitions. Let the sound of war and strife soon die out of the world's sky. Give us vision to see the best struggling through the worst and may we move forward with a great faith that God is more than equal to any crisis. Lead us on—up the hills of time, and in some hour of triumph we shall see the mists lifted, the clouds rolled away, and behold the full glory of our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations on a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13615) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1923, and prior fiscal years, and to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. If no one else does, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries may sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries may sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, pending consideration of the agricultural bill the question was asked me by Mr. SNELL, of New York, relative to the appropriations by the States and municipalities for the control and eradication of rodents and for the extermination of predatory animals. I have that statement, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1922.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAKER: Replying to your letter of December 26 in regard to cooperative funds, and agreeable to telephone conversation on the subject, there is inclosed a statement showing the cooperative funds contributed by each State in which we are working as well as the sources from which the funds are derived.

This statement covers the funds for the control and eradication of rodents and for the extermination of predatory animals. The amounts shown under the column "State" indicate that those sums are specifically appropriated; under "Counties," that counties within the State contribute that amount; and under "Other sources," amounts from individuals, live-stock and other organizations.

If additional information is needed in regard to our work, please do not hesitate to call upon us.

Very truly yours,

W. C. HENDERSON,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

Preliminary report on cooperative funds available for expenditure for rodent and predatory animal work for the fiscal year 1923.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., December 29, 1922.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House Office Building, Washington:

Have heard congressional subcommittee Agricultural appropriations not recommending any increase predatory animal control work in California. Two-thirds land in California under supervision Federal Government national parks. Forests where coyotes breed, predatory animals driving many sheepmen out of business. Must have relief. Urge you make fight immediately to increase appropriation. California Farm Bureau, cattlemen, and woolgrowers united in asking increase in appropriation.

CALIFORNIA WOOLGROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13593, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate—how much time does the gentleman from Colorado desire? We have very few requests on this side.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have had requests at the present time for 75 minutes. I would like to have about an hour and a half if I can.

Mr. SLEMP. I am wondering if the gentleman can not get along with an hour. We can do our work on this side in that time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Possibly the gentleman can give some time on that side.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it the intention of the gentleman to pass the bill to-day, if possible?

Mr. SLEMP. If possible up to the final vote.

Mr. DOWELL. It certainly can not be possible if there is two hours taken in general debate.

Mr. SLEMP. We will have an hour on a side; that is about as little as possible. This is a large bill.

Mr. DOWELL. The length of time in general debate will control the question of whether the bill is completed to-day, and if two hours of time in general debate is taken up I doubt if it can.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We will try to get along with an hour if the gentleman will be liberal under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is possible I might want 20 minutes under general debate, and the gentleman from Colorado says he is unable to provide only about 10 minutes.

Mr. SLEMP. I think I can give the gentleman 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13593, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13593, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill is the largest bill presented to Congress. This year it carries an appropriation of over $584,000,000, an increase of $20,000,000 plus over the appropriation for 1923. This increase would be a little less than 4 per cent. It is estimated, however, that the increase in postal receipts of 1924 over 1923 would be about 9 per cent.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I noticed some days ago in the press that General Dawes, formerly Budget Director, made certain statements about the Post Office management in that department.

He stated in substance that the Post Office Department did not know what a balance sheet was, and he went on to state that in the fiscal year 1920–21 the deficit of the Post Office Department was $157,000,000, and in the fiscal year 1921–22 it was $60,000,000. Speaking for myself, I know I have never heard on the floor of the House, here or elsewhere, that there has been any such deficit in the Post Office Department as $157,000,000. I am sure the gentleman from Virginia knows about the Post Office Department, and if General Dawes makes a correct statement the country ought to know it, and if he does not make a correct statement the House and the country ought to know that.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say in response to the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas that in the reclassification act of 1920 Congress added a considerable sum of money to the expenses of the Post Office Department. The Interstate Commerce Commission rendered its decision giving higher rates to the railroads, and $157,000,000 was the deficit for that particular year. Of that it is estimated that about $76,000,000 was due to the acts of Congress so passed, and were for previous years to the year in which the deficit was referred to, leaving about $80,000,000 net deficit between the postal expenditures and the postal receipts. The following year the Post Office Department ran its business without any increase in expense at all, but the receipts went up $20,000,000, and therefore the deficit for the succeeding year was $60,000,000. That was for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1922. This fiscal year the department is running almost on the same basis as last year, and the increase in receipts over expenditures ought to allow a further cut of $30,000,000 in the operation of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman makes a rather peculiar statement. I do not understand it exactly. He says that there was a $157,000,000 deficit in 1920–21, but that in reality there was only $80,000,000 actual deficit. Now, he says in the next year the Post Office Department was running without any additional expense and cut down $20,000,000. Does he mean that there was a $137,000,000 deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. I was explaining that that has all been absorbed, and the $70,000,000 and odd referred to was covered by the acts of Congress that I referred to.

Now, going on with the statement, the deficit of last year, ending June 30, 1922, was $60,000,000. It is expected that this year the receipts will have grown so that the deficit will, perhaps, be only $30,000,000 or $31,000,000, and that next year they ought, perhaps, to break even.

That is the record of the Post Office Department. Now, as to the balance sheet that the gentleman from Arkansas referred to——

Mr. OLDFIELD. One more question, if the gentleman will permit. Does the gentleman agree with Mr. Dawes that there was an actual deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. Those were the statements of the Postmaster General in the annual report in each succeeding year, and those have been published for several months and years back.

Mr. OLDFIELD. What about the criticism of General Dawes in regard to the bookkeeping of the Post Office Department?

Mr. SLEMP. Well, I will say in regard to that that I have not found the statement myself, and the Post Office Department does not seem to be able to find the statement to which the gentleman refers; but there has been a general overhauling of the accounting system of the Post Office Department. A good deal of the work is being done in the various States. Some of it is being done here, and a lot of it has been transferred to the General Comptroller's office with very much better, up-to-date results. It is not quite possible to gather a monthly balance sheet. It is very nearly possible to gather a quarterly balance sheet.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Did General Dawes when he was Director of the Budget advise the committee or the Post Office Department, to the gentleman's knowledge, as to how the books should be kept and how the balance sheet should be prepared?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say that the Director of the Budget at that time did not appear before the committee that framed the Post Office appropriation bill last year; neither did he come before the committee this year; and, so far as I know, the director last year had very little to do with working up the details of the Post Office appropriation bill. It was understood that the gentleman was here rather representing both the Post Office Department and the Budget and the Otis Elevator Co.; but he did not spend a great deal of time in the Post Office Department, however, and after the committee got through its investigation the committee recommended a cut of $27,000,000 in the recommendations of the Budget last year for the Post Office Department. That was increased a little in the Senate. As a result it is proposed to run the department on about $15,000,000 less than the Budget estimate.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say this, that the deficiency in the appropriation bill for 1922 indicates $62,000,000. The first quarter—and that is the quarter to which General Dawes referred—indicated $16,000,000; and that would not be more than the quarterly proportion of the $62,000,000 if it were distributed for the full year, so that there was nothing irregular about it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Then it seems that General Dawes was substantially correct in his statement?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no question about there being a $16,000,000 deficit for the first quarter.

Mr. OLDFIELD. It seems to me that the department might take General Dawes's advice about the bookkeeping, and go on and straighten this thing out, so that there would be no criticism about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Under the Budget law, I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas, all the bookkeeping of the Post Office Department, except the mere departmental audit, has been transferred to the General Accounting Office.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it anticipated that there will continue to be a quarterly deficit during the next fiscal year of anything approximating $62,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. It is estimated that the present fiscal year will show $31,000,000 instead of $62,000,000, and in the next fiscal year it is expected they will come out even, or have a million dollars surplus.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If I understand the gentleman's statement, it means about this, that Congress itself is responsible for this increase?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. It is expected, however, that the increase for 1924 over 1923 will be about 9 per cent. If this hope be realized, there would be a net clear gain or profit in the operation of the Postal Service of about 5 per cent, which applied to $533,000,000, the postal revenues of 1923, would amount to approximately $25,000,000. As the difference between receipts and expenditures for 1923 is estimated to be only $31,000,000, this gain of $25,000,000 if realized would enable the department almost to run on a self-sustaining basis in 1924. This has been one of the great objects of the Post Office Department officials, the other being to give good and constantly better service. It can positively be said that these two ends are being accomplished by the present Postmaster General and his able assistants.

I doubt if any department of the Government at any time has been served by the same efficiency and devotion to the work as is now the case with the present Post Office Department. How fortunate they are to have men as assistants who can command higher salaries elsewhere and who only occupy their present positions through pure love of service. The first assistant, formerly executive of a great Commonwealth, an eminent lawyer, finds himself engrossed with the details of a great department and unselfishly and devotedly gives his time practically free to the Government. The fine showing of the department is due to the extraordinary activity and cooperation of the officials, and they are entitled to the thanks of Congress and the country.

The actual accomplishment of the department officials is shown not only by better service but by the constantly diminishing deficit. A deficit of $81,000,000 in 1921, $61,000,000 in 1922, $30,000,000 in 1923, and break even in 1924, would be an accomplishment unparalleled in the history of the Postal Service, and yet there is every probability that this will be realized. In this connection, permit me to say that the amount recommended to be appropriated this year provides for every activity of the Postal Service and for every employee now connected with it. It provides for increases in the clerks' force, in the clerks' auxiliary force, in the letter-carrier force, in the substitute letter-carrier force, in the Rural Free Delivery Service, in the railway mail pay and service, in the increasing foreign mail, all to meet the remarkable growth in the postal business.

An estimate by months, increase of 1923 over 1922:

	Per cent.
July (increase)	11.02
August (increase)	10.80
September	11.55
October	14.34
November	13.79
Total (gain)	12.30

December, probably $20,000 for 50 largest offices.

Thirteen and fifty-nine one-hundredths per cent increase for these 50 offices. It is hoped that this large increase in business will be absorbed this fiscal year without any increase in appropriation of 1923 over 1922, and the future increase in business in 1924 of 9 per cent to be taken care of by an increase of 4 per cent in expenditures. It is impossible for me to describe the activities of the Post Office Department, nor the marvelous field of its operation. It enters every home, is related to every activity, and is the greatest contributor to education and advancing civilization.

In the bill there are only 82 items, 64 of which are unchanged from the estimate, 17 of which are reduced, and 1 alone increased. Total reduction is $5,552,000, and this is less than 1 per cent. The committee therefore agrees with the department, more than 99 per cent out of a possible 100 per cent. The small cuts made are the free judgment of the subcommittee in charge of the bill after careful reflection and extensive hearings.

Now, in regard to the bill itself, I should like to say to the committee that the Post Office Department here in Washington under the Postmaster General is proposed to be run next year on $60,000 less than this year, and in addition to that to absorb the payment of the salary of the solicitor, formerly paid by the Department of Justice.

There is no change recommended in the First, Second, or Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's offices. The Postal Savings is transferred from the Postmaster General to the Third Assistant. There is a very slight increase in the department service, of $7,000, due to the increased price of coal. Outside of that, there is no change in the department.

In regard to the field service, the First Assistant asked for an increase of $14,000,000 and the committee have recommended an increase of $11,000,000, an increase in his appropriation of about 4 per cent. The reductions recommended were in clerk hire and in rent of buildings largely and a slight reduction cutting down the overtime of letter carriers, but still leaving a very substantial increase in the amount carried over this year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. With reference to the rent of buildings, does the committee actually believe it is possible to reduce the rental of buildings at this time?

Mr. SLEMP. There is no provision for a reduction in the rent of buildings. The appropriation carried this year is $11,750,000, and that will rent all the buildings in the country that we used for post-office purposes throughout this fiscal year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understood the gentleman to say that there was a reduction.

Mr. SLEMP. A reduction from the estimates but an increase over the amount carried this year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the increase?

Mr. SLEMP. It is one million two hundred thousand and some odd dollars, an increase of more than 10 per cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Many of the leases that are expiring are 10-year leases?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, you can not begin to renew the leases for the same rental now.

Mr. SLEMP. There are 510 of these leases expiring next year, and it is estimated that renewal contracts can be had at 100 per cent increase. That is the testimony of the Post Office Department, that they will need that increase, and that is what we are providing for.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. One further question, with reference to carriers. In Chicago, in the thickly settled territory, in residence and business districts, deliveries have been reduced to two a day. When I was home last fall I had to leave my home at 8.10 in the morning to get a train down town, and up to that moment there was no delivery of mail. I never got any mail until I got home at night. The department heads said that was because of lack of appropriations; that they were compelled to reduce deliveries in populous cities to two a day.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman, so far as that is concerned, that there are 462 vacancies now in carriers' positions already appropriated for by Congress, which the department could use if it desired this fiscal year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Four hundred and sixty-two carriers will not go very far.

Mr. SLEMP. I know; but they have not used them up to date, and we are providing next year for everyone that the Post Office Department requests.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. For every carrier requested by the department?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute there?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to my colleague [Mr. CHINDBLOM] that we provided in the bill for the current fiscal year for an increase of 1,400 carriers. Four hundred and eighty-two of those have not been appointed. We are providing for 1,400 additional carriers for the coming fiscal year, which, added to the 482, would make 1,882 more than are employed at present, so it is not the fault of the appropriation if there are not carriers enough.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There must be some fault, then, in the distribution of the carriers.

Mr. MADDEN. We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. SLEMP. That is the fact as far as the appropriation is concerned.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman made some statement about the amount appropriated for clerk hire, and I understood him to say that the committee had reduced the amount.

Mr. SLEMP. We made a reduction from the estimates.

Mr. DENISON. A reduction from the amount estimated for clerk hire?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Upon what theory is it supposed that we can get along now with less clerk hire than heretofore?

Mr. SLEMP. We do not.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I want to inquire about.

Mr. SLEMP. The appropriation last year was about $101,000,000. That did not seem to be quite enough, and perhaps there will be a deficit in that this year. The department asked for $108,000,000, an increase of about $7,000,000 over this year's appropriation, and the committee recommended $750,000 less than the estimate. That is to say, the committee recommended one hundred and seven million and some odd thousands of dollars, an increase over this year's appropriation of a little over 6 per cent.

I will say to the gentleman that the Treasury Department called on the Post Office Department for clerks for the purpose of handling war savings stamps and Treasury certificates, causing an expense of about $2,000,000, and that work will be largely relieved after January 1.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me state to my colleague [Mr. DENISON] that for the current fiscal year we provided for an increase of 2,600 clerks and they have appointed only 1,310. We are providing for 2,500 additional clerks for the coming year, which, added to the 1,290 who have not been appointed, will give 3,800, so it is not our fault if they are not appointed.

Mr. DENISON. The reason I asked the question is that in the district which I represent the greatest difficulty the Post Office Department has is in the inability to secure efficient clerks for the amount allowed.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about third-class post offices now?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; mainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The law fixes the limit of compensation. The law says the Postmaster General is authorized to employ clerks at $600 or $900 or $1,200. One thousand two hundred dollars is the maximum.

Mr. DENISON. But in an emergency they may allow an additional amount. They are limited in the allowance of that by the amounts appropriated.

Mr. SLEMP. The committee allowed the full amount asked for for that.

Mr. DENISON. I have one post office in which the postmaster had to pay out every dollar of his salary for clerical help, and he had to go outside to make a living, and the inspector came down and recommended his removal for not giving his whole time to the office.

Mr. SLEMP. We provide every dollar for the increase that was asked. The Second Assistant Postmaster General's office—the service is left about the same. The Third Assistant's office—we have made a slight reduction from the estimate; and the Fourth Assistant's about the same, so that the bill as presented to the House carries $5,000,000 more than recommended by the Post Office Department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there is an increase of about 4 per cent in the appropriation for clerks and carriers?

Mr. SLEMP. More than that. The amount carried in the bill this year for clerks of the first and second class is $101,000,000, and we are giving one hundred and seven million and some thousands of dollars, being an increase of about 6 per cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There are increases in the number of carriers?

Mr. SLEMP. We give all the carriers that they request.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What about the clerks?

Mr. SLEMP. There is an increase of about 6 per cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That amounts to 2,500 clerks?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that the department out of this year's appropriation still has 1,290 clerks, if they want to appoint them during the remainder of the year. They are managing to get the mail distributed and keeping the work up with the present force.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They never have been able to do that before.

Mr. SLEMP. It has been done once, but there are many elements that enter into the cost so that no one can get the cost absolutely. The Post Office Department does a lot of work for the Treasury Department—about $2,000,000. They do the airplane work, about $2,000,000, and then we pay a subsidy to American vessels for carrying the mails, and all of that amounts to several million dollars a year that the accounting system might make it less.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to state that the new Republican postmaster for Sweetwater, Tex., Hon. M. B. Howard, patriotically remained in his post office all day last Sunday and all day Monday—Christmas—in order that all the people there could be served, and he promptly delivered every package and every letter that came in due time for the Christmas festivities. Is there another Republican postmaster in the Union that has as good a record?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say that that was done right here in the city of Washington.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. It was done everywhere where there was a Republican postmaster. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt that, but Mr. M. B. Howard is such a splendid gentleman, and has the confidence, esteem, and appreciation of all patrons of his office, that I think his selection tends to equalize many Republican mistakes.

Mr. SLEMP. I thank the gentleman for the praise, but I would like to call attention to what happened in December.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Last year there was a proposition that came up to reduce the appropriation for village delivery. I should like to know what this bill provides as to that item?

Mr. SLEMP. It is the same in the bill this year that it was last year; it is not reduced. There are $196,000 available for the extension of that service.

Mr. ROACH. No additional service has been installed?

Mr. SLEMP. Thirty-eight this year. I would like the committee to hear an account of the remarkable service that we had during the month of December. The expenses of the Post Office Department, 1923, are not much greater than 1922, and the question has been whether the department could, without increasing the expenses, absorb the very large increase in business. I have telegrams here from many cities. Grand Rapids, Mich., handled 25 per cent more business. Seattle the same. Chicago business increase, 32 per cent; situation well in hand; mail moved. Denver, Colo., increase, 62 per cent. Omaha, 51 per cent. Richmond, Va., 40 per cent. Dayton, Ohio, 15 per cent. Minneapolis, 44 per cent on outgoing mail and 20 per cent on incoming mail. Kansas City, 21 per cent; no delay or congestion. Buffalo, 17 per cent increase. Toledo, 20 to 25 per cent increase. Jacksonville, 11 per cent on outgoing mail and 40 per cent on mail received. Jersey City increase, 30 per cent. Atlanta, 20 per cent. Springfield, Mass., 25 per cent; no congestion.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman state how late those telegrams are?

Mr. SLEMP. These were put into the RECORD the day before Christmas.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, there was a statement given early in the spring that out of 38 cities there was an increase averaging a little less than 10 per cent.

Mr. SLEMP. I just said to the committee a few moments ago that the average increase for five months was about 12 per cent, and the expected increase materialized in December of 20 per cent, and the average will be about 13 per cent. Of course, this is derived from 50 of the largest offices in the country and not from the third or fourth class offices. It is a fair barometer.

Mr. FESS. I was about to say that that is as fair a barometer as there could be.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. I have here a clipping from the Washington Times of a few days ago, which I ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORD MAKES COKE; SELLS TO WORKERS.

[By International News Service.]

DETROIT, MICH., December 26.—The Ford Motor Co., by producing coke and selling it to employees at $8 a ton, is saving workers approximately $100,000 each month on their coal bills.

According to estimates, about 500 tons daily are now being delivered to the homes of workers, which means that Highland Park, River Rouge, and other plants receive approximately 12,500 tons monthly.

Thus these employees are assured of a ton a month minimum each at a fair price, according to the Ford News.

With coke selling throughout Detroit and vicinity at from $14 to $16 a ton, it will be seen that workers, individually, are able to save in many cases from $6 to $8, or virtually what the company asks for a ton.

Before the season ends it is estimated the Ford Motor Co. will have saved its workers $1,000,000 on fuel bills.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, from that press dispatch it will be observed that Mr. Ford is manufacturing and selling coke to his employees at approximately one-half the price being charged by the coal barons. That, in my judgment, is a fair illustration of what the farmers of this country may expect in the way of fertilizer if he should be permitted to operate the Muscle Shoals plant. Actions speak louder than words. Mr. Ford is a man of few words but of very much action.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this morning's Herald quotes the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN, in the following statement:

The Massachusetts Member said that he had been told that practically every Democrat from Texas is a member of the Ku-Klux Klan.

I doubt very seriously whether any Member of the Texas delegation belongs to that order. If any Member does, I do not know it. I do not belong, and I think the kind of talk that is going around the country such as that contained in this morning's paper, indicating that the State of Texas is dominated by the Ku-Klux Klan, ought to stop.

One of the leaders of the Klan in Texas, a man who edits the Klan paper, ran for lieutenant governor and was overwhelmingly defeated. Another distinguished member of the Klan who ran on the State ticket for State superintendent of public instruction was defeated. So all this talk ought to stop. I presume that some of the best people in this whole Nation are members of the order.

I presume that some of the best ministers of the gospel in that State are members of the order, but when it comes to votes, they do not vote for a man in Texas just because he is a member of the Ku-Klux Klan. I do not believe there is a single Member of the 18 Congressmen from Texas who is a member of that order. Therefore, why does the newspaper still continue to send this dope out over the country? For prejudice. That is all. I presume that there are men in Texas who belong to this order who probably are just as good citizens as many of us here. I am not making any fight on the order.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from Texas seems to be blaming the newspaper. I understood that the newspaper was merely publishing a statement made by one of the Members of the House. Is that correct?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Why does the gentleman blame the newspaper?

Mr. BLANTON. This is why I blame the newspaper: When the newspaper had that statement from the gentleman from Massachusetts it was very easy for the reporter to see the 18 Members of the Texas delegation in Congress and ask them whether or not they were members of the order.

Mr. DENISON. Then the gentleman thinks a newspaper ought not to repeat any statement made by a Member of the House unless he first makes an investigation to find out whether the statement is true?

Mr. BLANTON. I was just suggesting that sometimes these newspapers convey wrong impressions. This is a Hearst newspaper. The Hearst newspapers cover the entire United States, and this article doubtless appears to-day in every Hearst newspaper, and it conveys the intimation to the American people that every Member of Congress from Texas is dominated by this secret order, when, as a matter of fact, I do not think any of them are members of it, and it is wrong. It is a prejudice that is created that is not right, and it ought to stop. [Applause.]

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, no one seems to be occupying the floor, and if no one desires to speak, I should like 15 minutes in which to talk about the scenic beauties of the Pacific coast.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am a new member from the State of Ohio on this great committee.

Mr. McARTHUR. And a very useful member.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the gentleman. I want to take your time for a few moments to give you some of the impressions that I received as I listened to the marvelous story of the activities of this wonderful piece of governmental machinery. Marvelous scarcely expresses just what is taking place within this wonderful governmental activity. There appeared first before that committee one of America's biggest men, a man who, through his own industry, perseverence, skill, and ability, has found a place in the activities of this country second to none in his own particular line of endeavor. Yet he is giving to this country at this time his services for a paltry salary. Salary means nothing to men of this type, because they deem it a patriotic privilege to serve, and this great, big, wonderful man has been serving this country in this position without any claquers or sycophants surrounding him, doing the work that comes to him each and every day in a way that challenges the admiration of the people of the Nation. I refer to the Postmaster General, Doctor Work. [Applause.] His duties are general. I shall not attempt to indicate just what they are, because many of you are better acquainted with them than I. However, his great grasp of details enables him to keep in splendid touch at all times with the activities of this department, and he has supporting him as First Assistant Postmaster General another man of equal importance in this great country, and in the achievements that were his before he became active in governmental affairs in a national way. He, too, is here serving as a patriotic privilege the people of this country, not for price, because he deems it a great opportunity to do something for the country that has given to him and all others who will the opportunity that is here for all. So we find that great man ex-Governor Bartlett in the position of First Assistant Postmaster General. His duties are onerous. His duties require the highest type of executive ability and great courage, and why? Because he has to do with the appointment of postmasters, he has to stand between we folks up here and the department, to see that the department gets the best service and the best men; and I am glad to hear to-day the word of encouragement come from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], for a Republican in Texas is indeed a rare bird, and I am glad that he is so good that he has received the commendation of one so critical as the talented gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON.]

But the duties of the First Assistant Postmaster General require that he meet in mental combat the grafters and those who would be the profiteers on this Nation in fixing the rentals of post-office buildings here, there, and elsewhere, and we found, as he testified before this committee, that in renewing leases here, there, and everywhere throughout the country the cost was increasing about 100 per cent, and he suggested that it would be money saved by the Government were it possible to standardize Government buildings and so arrange them for the conduct of business in such a way that they could be built at a nominal cost, and he cited this illustration of the needs of the Government. In the city of Chicago the postal business has grown in such an unprecedented way that they found it necessary to contract with private builders and private owners for a building sufficiently large enough to take care of the postal business of that wonderful city, and there they have a building built by private owners, leased to the Government for a period of years, a building 800 feet in length and a number of stories in the air, equipped with the latest and most modern machinery, and that building is owned by private individuals when the Government itself ought to own it. He contended that it is shortsighted policy to conduct business in that way. He also called attention to conditions in the city of New York, where they will again have to depend upon private enterprise and find buildings in which to house the activities of this wonderful department at a very great cost to the Government. Yes; it reads and listens like a romance as you sit and hear the story unfolded of this wonderful activity. That brings me down to the great big young he-man who occupies the position of Second Assistant Postmaster General. A young man who has vision, a young man who makes dreams come true, a young man who came to the Congress and asked that appropriations be made to the end that he might try out a new device which was invented by an American but which had to be developed somewhere overseas. He asked the Congress to give him some hundreds of thousands of dollars which he is using to develop the fact that it is going to be possible to take a letter in New York City, place it on board one of these ships and deliver it in San Francisco in the short space of 30 hours. Why, the rubbing of Aladdin's lamp, dream of all the wonderful things of fairy land could not picture anything more dramatic than that story. And this young man is coming to Congress again to ask for permission to try out night flying. They have demonstrated that it is possible to fly more safely in the air than it is to travel about this city of Washington in an automobile. It has been demonstrated by this department that they have flown over two million four hundred and some thousand miles and not one life has been given up in the experiment. It could not be anything but a success under the splendid management and guidance of this young man who does things as well as dream them, and I hope that he will succeed in getting the appropriations necessary to bring about that which I have just described.

You may be interested to know that this flying service that has been in operation for a number of months, that it is planned along the line of the railroad delivery of mail. For instance, in the railroad business a division is divided up into about 100 miles. The engineer and his crew take charge of a train and guide it safely over the piece of track for 100 miles. It takes the man at the throttle about 2½ or 3½ hours to make that trip. In the air mail service they have divided this distance up into legs of about 200 or 225 and some odd miles. I think there is one leg of the trip that covers about 300 miles. These fliers board their ships and it is about two hours from the time they take the air until they land their ship at the division point, and another flier takes charge of the ship and carries it on leg by leg just as the railroad business is run, but does it in one-half the time. Yes, it costs a trifle more to carry mail in the air than it does on the railroad, but some one must develop the airplane and its possibilities, and this young man, having charge of the transportation of the mails on the land, on the water, and in the air, has shown to the world the wonderful possibilities of this activity. And I would suggest right here that every city in America that expects to keep abreast of the times ought at the earliest possible moment to provide itself with a landing field for airplanes because it is not a far cry to see freight carried by airplanes; important express matter will be carried by these airplanes and delivered; and so it is necessary for those who are looking ahead to prepare for the day that is just around the corner, and this young man, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, if the Congress gives to him this small additional allowance that he is asking for, will demonstrate to a waiting world that American enterprise will bring to the world that which it never dreamed of before. Yes, there is so much that can be told that I can not take the time here now. You have been very patient with me, but I would suggest to every Member of the House that he look into and inform himself of this particular matter, because it is, as I have said, just around the corner. And I do hope that the Congress will be wise; I do hope that the Congress will give to this young man the opportunity to demonstrate to the world the wonderful possibilities of which I have just been speaking.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The young man ought not to have any trouble. He won over the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on a very momentous occasion, and if he has not lost his address he ought to be able to do it again.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I agree thoroughly with my friend as to the need of cities providing landing fields. Certain cities have already gone to that expense of providing landing fields, but they have no way of connecting up with this air mail as they would like.

Mr. MURPHY. That is just around the corner also. It will be necessary to blaze a trail by a peculiar light that has not yet been fully decided upon; to blaze a trail for the leg of flying at night; and as at present outlined, that leg will be from Chicago to Cheyenne, a distance of 900 miles. The young man who has worked out this problem says that we shall need about 30 landing fields in that distance. These fields will not be expensive, because perhaps 20 of them will never be used, save only, perchance, in the case of accident. But they can be planted and operated by the farmers who use them. The lights, the landing lights on these fields, will be operated by the farmer who owns the field and leases the same to the Government. The details of this wonderful plan have all been worked out, and I suspect that there are others who will talk upon this question to-day who will bring it to you, perhaps, in a better way than I have been able to do it, but I do hope that in the wonderful story of the operations of this great department you will find enough to justify any vote you may give to this department to spend the money which they are asking for this wonderful experiment.

And, by the way, I want to say to you that I am glad to note that those who labor in this department of governmental activity are receiving a good wage at the present time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McKENZIE). The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will take just a little time myself. I will yield to myself 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to preface my remarks by saying that the chairman of this subcommittee [Mr. SLEMP] deserves the thanks and appreciation not only of the House of Representatives and of Congress but of the entire country for the splendid manner in which he handles this Post Office appropriation bill. He seems to have a natural adaptation for readily understanding business on a large scale, as well as all its details, and he has also an alert insight into governmental affairs generally and the workings of the Post Office Department that is akin to genius.

The diligence that he has displayed in figuring out ways of legitimately reducing expenses and bringing about economy without injury to its services is certainly refreshing, and as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee I am pleased to make this public tribute to his rare earnestness, exceptional capability, and untiring energy. [Applause.] While our hearings have not extended over as many days or weeks as some former hearings, I doubt if any former hearing has ever been more thorough than ours, because of the fact that we have received such an exceptional amount of assistance from the departmental officials.

I want also to join in paying a high tribute especially to Postmaster General Work and to First Assistant Postmaster General Bartlett and Second Assistant Postmaster General Henderson. No one could be with those gentlemen as we were seven or eight hours every day going over all the details of this enormous department without knowing that they do their utmost to conduct that department in a businesslike manner and are conscientiously rendering a splendid service to the country. As you all know, Postmaster General Work comes from my State. In Colorado everybody calls him Doctor Work, because for 35 years he has been one of the most distinguished physicians and prominent citizens of the West. Colorado is proud of him, and we all know that he will so administer this great department with its 335,000 employees that the entire country will be proud of him. [Applause.]

THE AIR MAIL SERVICE.

But, Mr. Chairman, I arose to speak briefly upon the subject of our airplane mail service. On this subject our country has come to a parting of the ways. We must either stop or go forward. The only logical or sensible thing for Congress to do is either to discontinue the appropriation of $1,500,000 for carrying on the present service or appropriate $2,500,000 to extend and improve it. Without hardly an exception, I think all of the 35 members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House are in favor of our going ahead and developing, improving, and extending our air mail service by establishing night flying and demonstrating its entire practicability. The Postmaster General and the First and Second Assistants and Mr. Egge, the superintendent of the air mail service, and all the experts say that we have demonstrated fully and conclusively that daylight flying is a success, that daylight carrying of mail is a success, so far as carrying a limited amount of mail across the country is concerned. We do not need to spend any more money to demonstrate that. If we are not going to progress any there is no necessity of Congress continuing the present $1,500,000 annual appropriation—it was $1,900,000 last year—for the continuation of the air mail service that we are now operating every day in the year except Sundays and holidays from New York to San Francisco. But the fact is that just daylight flying does not expedite the mail enough to warrant the expense. We have got to develop night flying before airplane mail service will ever be of substantial value in the Postal Service or be either a financial or a commercial success.

There is no place in the world where night flying is in operation at the present time. I believe the forward-looking people of this country hope that our Nation will go ahead and further develop the airplane service by demonstrating that night flying is practicable. It is true, of course, that we do expedite a large amount of mail across the country every day. I have here the schedule of all of the 24 airplanes that are in the air every day. The westbound flight leaves New York City at 7 o'clock in the morning with 500 pounds of letter mail, and travels westward 225 miles to Bellefonte, Pa., by 10 a. m. Another airplane and another pilot leave Bellefonte at 10.15 a. m. and go on to Cleveland, Ohio, 210 miles, by 1 p. m. Another pilot and plane leave Cleveland that morning at 9 a. m. and fly to Bryan, Ohio, 160 miles, by 10 a. m., and another plane leaves Bryan at 10.20 a. m. and flies 175 miles to Chicago by 12.25, and so on from Chicago 195 miles to Iowa City, thence 230 miles to Omaha, thence to North Platte 245 miles, thence to Cheyenne, Wyo., 215 miles, and so on to San Francisco; 2,680 miles. I could tell you how much mail they each pick up and how much they drop, and to what extent in time and what amount in volume they accelerate the transportation of the mail across the country. There is no continuous flight across the country. It is a relay, or, rather, a succession of individual flights between certain cities. The outgoing usually leaves before the incoming plane arrives. But, roughly speaking, they do expedite or advance the mail approximately one business day right straight along across the continent.

Approximately the same kind of a schedule is being carried out at the same time beginning at San Francisco and going east.

The plane leaves San Francisco at 2.30 p. m. with 400 pounds of mail and flies over the range 190 miles to Reno, Nev., at 4.30 p. m. The Reno eastbound plane leaves at 7 a. m., reaches Elko, Nev., at 9.30 a. m., 235 miles, and at 9.45 a. m. leaves Elko for Salt Lake City, 205 miles, at 12 noon.

The eastbound plane leaves Salt Lake City at 7.30 a. m. for Rock Springs, Wyo., at 9. 15 a. m., 155 miles, and leaves there at 9.30 a. m. for Cheyenne, 240 miles, at 11.30, and so on east to New York.

Each pilot makes only one of those flights a day, and then flies back over the same route the next day with the same plane. He then rests one day, and then makes the same round trip the next two days.

That route is practically a straight line of 2,680 miles from New York to San Francisco. Adding up the relay flying time—that is the present schedule of the transcontinental trip—is 27½ hours. So we are perfectly safe in estimating that the day and night trip can be made in from 28 to 30 hours. It probably will be made within 24 hours within the next five years.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. Of course, we all know that aviation is in its infancy and that it is developing fast and that it is connected with every branch of industry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. It will very soon be one of the greatest and most important industries in the world.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not true that if the Government stops the development of it in the mail service private enterprise can not carry on that particular branch of development?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; that is absolutely true. There is no way at this time in which it can or will be developed into a paying mail utility except by Uncle Sam. It is not at this time a paying proposition at all for any private enterprise to carry mail. But if we go ahead and they use the appropriation of $1,000,000 or $1,500,000 more, they promise absolutely to demonstrate within the next two years that night flying is entirely practicable. As has been said by my colleague [Mr. MURPHY], they propose to establish a day and night route across the United States, starting from New York at any time up to noon, and flying to Chicago, and then a night route from Chicago to Cheyenne, Wyo., a distance of about 900 miles. They want to make about 30 emergency landing stations on that route. The reason they select that central distance for the night route is, in the first place, that it is a straight line over a flat country. They have already got it pretty well marked out. In the second place, they can always start from New York and make Chicago in daylight, and then make this night flight to Cheyenne, and the next forenoon, any time up to noon, they can leave Cheyenne and land in San Francisco, and every day make the same kind of a flight from San Francisco to Cheyenne and a night flight to Chicago, and thence to New York. In other words, it will be a flight of from 28 to 30 hours across the United States from east to west and from west to east every day.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. How much is the additional appropriation asked for to develop this proposed night flying?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A million dollars. The post office officials and airplane experts feel quite confident they can establish and work the route for $800,000 if we allow them to use an unexpended balance they now have on hand, but to cover all contingencies they ask Congress for $1,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And that will expedite the mail by flying a distance of 800 miles at night?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; 885, or practically 900 miles. That is the air-line distance between Chicago and Cheyenne, which will be its night section, going both ways. That money will be expended principally in establishing stations. You understand, they must have emergency stations about every 25 or 30 miles and have them brilliantly lighted at night, so that they can be seen for, say, 30 miles, and large enough so that a pilot can safely land on them at any time any night. And then they will have a string of guide lights about 3½ miles apart, so there will be a continuous string of lights, automatic in operation, from Chicago to Cheyenne to guide them, no matter how dark or foggy or stormy the weather may be.

For each of these emergency landing stations it is contemplated to lease a field or large square block of ground, at least an eighth of a mile wide and a quarter of a mile or more long, and surround each of them by brilliant beacon lights that can be readily seen for a distance of 30 miles or more and with ample space within them for the pilot to light safely in any kind of weather.

Those lights are about 70 feet above the ground and of a very intense white light; possibly some of them may be the so-called mercury vapor light. The lights will be automatic in operation. There will be 31 of those emergency landing fields between Chicago and Cheyenne. Those fields can all be leased of farmers and equipped for approximately $15,000 each, and they will, of course, have the necessary local caretaker and will only be used by the aviator in case of emergency. Probably 25 out of the 31 never will be used.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. SLEMP. I call attention to the fact that we are proposing that they may use the unexpended balance of 1923 during the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the unexpended balance will cut down this appropriation, so that personally I do not believe there will be over $800,000 required to establish all these 25 or 30 stations, which will be permanent, and to also erect this string of guide lights, some of them different colored lights, distinctive lights, but mostly white. There will also have to be some signals or instrument that will show the pilot how close he is to the ground at night. Also signals showing the directions and velocity of the wind, and probably some other night signals, especially for dark and stormy nights.

Now, if Congress will make this appropriation and establish that night route from Chicago to Cheyenne and develop a perfectly practical mail route of 28 hours between New York and San Francisco, each way, we believe it can be made a self-supporting proposition and that it will be taken up by other cities and throughout the country generally and that it will soon become a paying commercial enterprise. We hope and believe that the airplane carrying of mail will before long be taken over by private concerns and that the Government will be able to let contracts for the carrying of mail by airplane on all practical routes throughout the country and to retire from the business after it has demonstrated that it is a complete success.

This last year the Post Office airplanes flew practically 2,000,000 miles without an accident, with a percentage of efficiency of 94.46 per cent. For 10 consecutive weeks this last summer its operation was 100 per cent perfect. Each trip across the continent was started regardless of weather conditions and finished on schedule time. It is universally acknowledged to be the best air-mail service in the world. About 12,000 pounds, or 480,000 letters, are each day advanced practically one business day. Of course, between cities that are only 500 miles or less apart night air-mail service is not necessary or practical, because a night train will take all the mail there is put in the post offices up to 8 p. m., which is all of it, practically, and will deliver it in time to be distributed and delivered before office hours or in ample time for business the next morning.

This one transcontinental air-mail route is now carrying 2,380,000 pounds of letter mail each year at a cost of $2.50 per ton per mile.

All the details of all of this airplane-mail service and what they hope to develop are fully set forth in the printed hearing before this subcommittee. I might add that there is only one man on each airplane. There are 40 aviators in this service now, and 24 of them are making a flight every day regardless of weather conditions, except Sundays and holidays. They are scheduled to fly 1,800,000 miles a year. There are supposed to be 75 planes in active commission. That is two planes in perfect order on the ground for each one in the air. At present there are 66 good planes in operation and about 30 being put in order. Each plane in the air consumes about 25 gallons of flying gas per hour. One ship or plane is destroyed every month, approximately.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, as I am in control of the time of debate on this bill on the minority side, I yield to myself 10 minutes more. Your subcommittee earnestly hopes that the House will grant this appropriation and give the Second Assistant Postmaster General authority to go ahead with this tremendously important air-mail experimentation work. They have had very capable men in the field already about three months, and they have got this night route pretty well blocked out, including the landing stations and a great many of its details. They know the cost of these different stations. They know the cost of each one of these guide lights will be comparatively small. I will say that they take the Army Haviland planes with Liberty motors, all built in this country, and remodel them for about $1,700 each, and use them in this service, while private concerns want to charge $35,000 for remodeling each plane.

The Post Office Department is doing very commendable and economical work in remodeling these Army planes at a very reasonable cost. We get these planes from the Army. They are not the best kind of planes for this work, because there is not room in the fuselage or body of the airplane to carry more than about 600 or 700 pounds of mail—in fact, they only carry 500 pounds of mail. The Army planes are designed to carry bombs underneath. But we have got to put the mail inside the fuselage. Sooner or later there will be a different type of plane developed for the use of the Post Office Department that will carry several thousand pounds of mail and merchandise and some passengers. But at the present time the Army has an unlimited number of Liberty motors on hand and the air mail service is using the Haviland Army planes that the Government now owns.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. How many planes are now in service transporting mail?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are 24 planes in the air every day except holidays and Sundays, and there are 42 more right now in perfect condition and ready for use at a moment's notice.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does a plane leave New York daily?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; one leaves New York at 7.45 every morning and one leaves San Francisco at 2.30 every afternoon. I can give the gentleman the complete schedule. There are 35 pages in the printed hearings, beginning at page 222, giving an elaborate presentation of the whole matter, and anyone who wants to study it can get a history of the airplane mail business right up to date. It is a splendid presentation of it and our committee gave a great deal of attention to it.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CABLE. Is it intended to buy real estate with this appropriation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; we will not have to buy hardly any real estate at all. We will use farmers' fields for the 31 emergency landing stations, and lease them for a term of years at a nominal sum. The farmers will continue to use them for meadows or pastures, or possibly for small grain, so that we do not have to buy or pay much for them. We learn that the use of the ground occupied by the guide lights every 3½ miles will cost very little. The Government now owns the Chicago station, which is a very important one.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state the time it will take to transport the mail from New York to San Francisco when you get night flying?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Twenty-eight hours will be the time schedule with the kind of planes we use now.

Mr. DENISON. What is the fastest time that they make by train?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. About 84 hours. I have had marked out the route and each station of the 14 present stations on this large United States map I have here, and the time when each machine leaves each station, and what mail it takes up, where it drops the mail, the number of pounds it carries, and the whole story of what we are doing at the present time in the field. Also whether the Government owns or leases the field.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not true that in Europe before the end of the war they began to develop commercial aviation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. They also had the Government mail service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. They have rather a limited amount of air mail service, but they have no night air mail service anywhere in the world to-day. Your committee feels that as a matter of patriotic pride, as a matter of our national importance and standing, as a matter of preparedness and of self-defense, as a matter of our natural, necessary, and inevitable development in mail service, and commercially, and every other way, that it is of the utmost importance that this air service should be continued and developed, improved and encouraged as much and as fast as is reasonably possible.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is the plan to stick to the 14 points. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; unless something else is shown to be better. I do not believe President Wilson had anything to do with selecting the 14 points at which the airplanes light every day between New York and San Francisco. But they are the most practical route. They are a straight course, and I think it will be the plan of the Government to stick to them.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ROSENBLOOM] that there may be some reservations put on in the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, this committee believes that, so far as carrying the mail by this daylight route is concerned, the novelty is worn off. People will not pay an extra amount to carry a letter between New York and Pittsburgh, or Baltimore, or Philadelphia, or Washington, or between a great many of the large cities that are only 500 miles or so apart and between which the trains run every night. There is no object in doing so. We have got to think about the financial and practical side of it; also the habits of business men. We do not get much mail in the post office at night after the evening trains leave, and there is consequently comparatively little letter mail to go out in the morning. When an airplane leaves a city in the morning it often has very little mail. People put their mail in the post office in the afternoon and evening, and the evening trains take all the day's accumulated mail and they run 500 miles at night. So that, as far as the daylight flying is concerned, it is not a practical proposition at all from a financial point of view. We must either develop night flying or quit the air-mail business. There is no use in spending a million and a half dollars or more a year just to keep up this day service, because the business men will not pay anything extra for it. They will not buy air-mail stamps at even 15 cents apiece. They are putting their mail in the post office to go by train.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the airplane could pick up the mail 500 miles outside New York that might help some.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. This air-mail service is doing a wonderful work. They are right now expediting nearly a hundred million letters a year and delivering them in approximately 24 hours—that is, I mean one business day—ahead of the time they would otherwise be delivered if they were carried by the trains. But that is such an infinitesimal per cent of the mail of this country that it is not at all sufficient to warrant or justify this expenditure of $1,500,000 a year merely as a mail proposition. I am now speaking of this situation purely from a business standpoint. If we are going to stand still it does not pay. We ought to either advance or quit. In writing even very important letters nowadays no one ever thinks of or pays any attention to this very limited air-mail service. So far as practical and continuous and regular and safe flying is concerned, and also carrying a limited amount of mail, it is a thoroughly demonstrated success. But it is not at all self-supporting. In fact, it does not pay anything at all. There is no cash return to the Government whatever at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman says that the air-mail service is not paying its way. What proportion is it paying; is it paying 50 per cent, 25 per cent, or what?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When we first established air mail service some three years ago Congress authorized an extra stamp charge for carrying a letter by airplane. But the novelty of that soon wore off and the department discontinued making any extra charge, because the planes had nothing to carry, so there is now no extra charge and no return.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In other words, we are now carrying mail by airplanes upon the same basis as by any other method and at a considerable financial loss. However, I am not criticizing the Mail Service on that account. Do these mail planes correspond to the bombing planes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; a good deal; they are the Haviland planes. I think they call them the DH 4's. But we have to remodel them, as I explained a few moments ago. If we demonstrate the feasibility of night flying generally all over the country, then we can and will again use an airplane stamp. We can give the people an expeditious mail service that they will gladly use and pay for. But by only flying in daylight there is not enough time gained to make it worth while and the people will not pay extra for the little extra time gained. But they will pay from 10 to 25 cents or more if we can send a letter across the country is 28 hours.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The Government has stopped putting an extra charge on the Airplane Service?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; because people quit buying airplane stamps. They would not pay the extra charge. Air mail service can and will sooner or later be a self-supporting, in fact, a paying, service. There are 40 letters to a pound, and a plane that carries 500 pounds carries 20,000 letters. If each letter carries a 10-cent stamp, that means $2,000 for each plane load of letters. But we will soon have airplanes that will carry at least 1,000 pounds of mail, and we can charge more than 10 cents for long flights, provided that we establish reliable night service. Otherwise not, under present conditions.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Does not the gentleman feel that in the country where this idea originated we are not altogether losing if the service does not pay in dollars and cents?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. We are demonstrating a certain thing in the Air Service and our country is way behind. As it happens, five minutes before the plane reaches the western end of its trip it passes over my district. About 3.40 o'clock every afternoon you can look up in the air and see one of these Government planes going overhead, and you can see it almost as surely as you turn your eyes upward.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and on that last section between Reno and San Francisco the airplanes often have to go up to a height of 15,000 feet to get over the mountains.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. They do in order to go over the Sierra Nevada Mountains. As a part of the national defense I feel that it is our duty to give encouragement to air transportation and develop all the ingenuity the country possesses in order that this service may be further developed, and I, for one, hope it will go through.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to myself five minutes more.

Fellow Members of the House, no human mind can grasp the future possibilities of the airplane. Our country can not afford to lag behind any other nation in the world in this great enterprise with such marvelous possibilities. A strong merchant air fleet is as necessary to the national defense of the future as a strong navy or a merchant marine. The status of commercial aviation in this country has a direct bearing on national defense. Commercial aviation properly developed will form a reserve power back of the military and naval aviation forces. And our forward-looking citizens throughout the country are not only urging legislation toward developing the airplane service but also toward stabilizing commercial aviation. I see by newspaper account of a report made by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce that the past year has been characterized by remarkable progress in design, construction, and operation. The report says:

> Nowhere else has there been such startling improvements. American pilots in American machines, powered with American motors, have obtained such results as to warrant the assertion that there has been the most significant series of achievements in the world's history of flight.

I also notice that public-spirited business organizations are urging that Congress encourage improvements in a great many ways toward the further and more rapid development of airplane service. And they point with pride to the fact that the world's record have recently been made by American aviators. They point to the fact that Lieut. John A. MacReady made the record altitude flight of 40,800 feet, and that he and Lieut. Oakley G. Kelly made the endurance record of 35 hours 18 minutes and 30 seconds in the air; and that those two men also made the long-distance record flight of 2,060 miles, while Lieut. R. L. Maughan made the speed record of 226 miles an hour. And that notwithstanding these superb records, of which we are all supremely proud, our Government is appropriating only about one-third of what either England or France are appropriating toward the development of aviation.

This is not a matter of dollars and cents. I am not appealing to you on that ground. Our committee appeals to you upon the ground of patriotic national pride. We ask you to make this small but absolutely necessary appropriation in order that our Government may go ahead and demonstrate to the world that we can establish a thoroughly practical night-flying mail service, and to be the first nation in the world that does so. We ask you to encourage the hundreds of splendid young men who are risking their lives every day to make this great service a great success. If Congress supports them, they will develop an air-mail service that will be the admiration of the civilized world. And your committee fervently hopes that the House will take the lead in this matter, and thereby justly merit and receive, as they will, the approval of the American people for so doing. [Applause.]

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to this wonderful opening of the doors of the future to what possibly and probably will occur, my mind goes back to the days of long ago when we never even dreamed of such things. When I was a little boy often we saw miles and miles of mule trains and cattle trains starting across the Great American Desert to go to Santa Fe. Then presently we learned that they had a railroad to Denver, and after a while we got notice that the great railroad at Salt Lake had been completed by the driving of a golden spike, and that we could ride by rail from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. As the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] spoke my mind reverted to the first edition I ever saw of Richardson's Beyond the Mississippi. He paints a glowing picture of the train that first reached Salt Lake and you hear the brakeman calling, "Salt Lake; change cars for San Francisco, Honolulu and the Pacific Ocean, Japan, China, the Philippines, India, and Australia." A wonderful vista to my youthful eyes. Since then, Mr. Chairman, I have made most of that journey myself, and in a very commonplace way, and it has become commonplace to all of us. Again, since that time we have gone through a series of developments of American business that has been brought to a point where men actually travel from New York to San Francisco in 28 hours. Gentlemen, you can shut your eyes and dream, and you will never in your fondest dreams reach the point of the limitations which time will bring. It is to go on and on.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I may say that it is contemplated we will be able to transport passengers where it is necessary for important personages to cross the country from New York to San Francisco, in case of war or other emergency.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. Of course, every time you turn your hand we meet with further progress. It is not only possible, but almost certain. I have just read this bill, and it calls for an appropriation of $584,000,000, and all this is possible because the Government has gotten behind it. They paid millions of dollars of real estate into the railroads which crossed the continent to San Francisco. Without the Government going into all this business there would not have been such a development of civilization and of our people's wealth and progress as there has been. Once in a while I hear some little bell tinkling in the rear of the procession as a friend bobs up and says that he is "against the Government going into business." There is nobody like that. You can tell when you see this bill come up. Every man in this Congress who is against the "Government going into business" will vote against this bill. If he does not, then he is not against the Government going into business. You may flatter yourself that you have some scheme by which you can make an alibi, but that is all it is, a manufactured alibi. Everyone who votes for this Post Office bill and its $584,000,000 is in favor of the Government going into business, whenever it is to the best interests of the people that it should. Nobody here would go any further than to aid our people. That is all that any of us who are most interested in the Post Office insist upon or even hope for.

Every year civilized governments go more and more into business. That is why civilization progresses so rapidly. I have proposed legislation which will make it unnecessary for the Government to go into the wheat business. It will give the farmer the full advantage of the laws of supply and demand; at present that is left to the grain gambler, who goes in through his bears and bulls. Give the wheat farmer the same aid you presented to the railroads and shipping people.

We want the Government to go into business whenever it is to the best interest of the people to do so. An immense amount of things never can be run for profit, and this is one of them. They must be done for the benefit of civilization and the people. We have done many things in the name of business, to assist business, and put the Government into business. Just the other day a majority of this House voted a subsidy of $50,000,000 a year to a few great millionaires who want to carry on a business at sea. A majority of this House is for that. Everybody here who voted for that is committed to the Government engaging in business or anything of a similar tenor that will help the lesser people. You can not afford to vote to give the millionaires $50,000,000 a year for some enterprise to roll in riches, and perhaps bring the Government no results, and then turn around and say that you will not help the American laboring man, that you will not help the American farmer. You did help the American laboring man when you passed the Esch-Cummins Act. That act provided, when we carried out President's Wilson's contract with the railroads, that the Government should assist them financially, so that they should be able to employ the men and pay them their wages, and without it they never would have been able to. Everyone on the railroad systems would have been on strike long before they were if this Congress had not voted such assistance to the railroads as enabled the Government to carry out Mr. Wilson's contract with them, and made it possible for them to pay their hands. You are committed to that. Why do you not begin to consider some assistance to the American farmer? The raising of wheat, the making of bread, is just as important as the transportation of it. The basis of all success in business is the success of the farmer. He is the man who feeds you, and if he strikes you all starve.

I have prepared and placed before the House and the Agricultural Committee a bill which calls for a permanent investment of $30,000,000, not an annual one of $50,000,000, for which you voted, to assist the American wheat producer in getting a dollar for his wheat by an ordinary, simple utilization in a plain business way of the laws of supply and demand for his benefit instead of the benefit of some one else. Men who voted eagerly for $50,000,000 a year to help somebody start in on ships they get for nothing say to me that the Government goes into business whenever it helps the farmer. I do not want anybody that I have any respect for to say that to me. If you do not want the farmer helped, say so, but do not tell me that you are opposed to the Government going into business; simply say that you are opposed to the Government giving anything to help the farmer, and be done with it.

I am glad of this opportunity to direct your attention to these points. Every man who voted for the subsidy and wants to preserve his self-respect, of course will not object when we vote a little money to aid the wheat farmer. Every railroad that is built could not have moved a foot unless the Government helped it. You come to my farm and you want a right of way over it and I do not want to sell. Then you go to your State, and the State exercises the right of eminent domain and makes it possible for you to build the railroad.

The State retains what is equivalent to a half interest in every railroad built. It is worth that much to them. If the State did not loan its right of eminent domain to the railroads the railroads would not be built. The State has what is equal to a half interest in each railroad, and therefore the State can regulate railroad rates—say what they ought to charge. That is all there is to it. They can say in this city what they can charge to carry you in a hack, and in the case where the railroad does the carrying on a public highway on steel rails it is equivalent to carrying you in a hack or your products in a truck. Now, when we resolve ourselves to the last analysis that is just where you stand.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinction about the Post Office business is that the Government engaging in it does not interfere with any private business, because there is no private competition. The Government has a monopoly there.

Mr. LITTLE. No; the gentleman does not go back far enough. There was at first, 100 years ago and more, great opposition to the Government engaging in the carrying of the mail. When I was in China private persons were carrying the mail. Then, in Shanghai, our post office was considered wonderful.

Mr. CARTER. And the parcel post, certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly. It is a great business benefit. But it is but a comparatively short time since people were carrying the mails and a very short time since people were collecting taxes—as, for instance, in India, only about 50 years ago, and in France, till the Revolution. Everything the Government does was at some time done by private citizens. Every time the Government takes a step forward and does something that was done by private people we hear people say, "Let us not go into business." Great God, that is what the Government was organized for, to go into business. Every policeman takes the place of some private night watchman. Let us not talk that way. Let us not say, "I am opposed to the Government going into business." Just say, "I am opposed to the Government going into this or that business." Let us be fair and sensible. You give a railroad the right of eminent domain and then vote that it may get a good investment return. Why should you put in half to build and then see it through? You vote that a railroad that runs on a public highway should charge enough to give it 5½ or 6 per cent return. Will you not vote for every farmer getting $1 a bushel—mere cost—on his wheat? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert the bill H. R. 13352.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. This bill is planned to do for wheat what the gold reserve did for the currency. Nobody wants gold if it is there in the reserve. Nobody will go to the United States for $1 a bushel as soon as they learn the United States will pay it. The grain dealers will pay that, and there will be no interference with the ordinary course of trade. This bill does not guarantee or fix the price. It depends on the ordinary rules of trade.

The bill is as follows—I hope gentlemen who discuss it will read it; it is a new proposition:

A bill (H. R. 13352) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase, store, and sell wheat, and to secure and maintain to the producer a reasonable price for wheat and to the consumer a reasonable price for bread, and to stabilize wheat values.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to buy wheat of such grades and quality as he designates, at such times and places as he directs, at not to exceed $1.10 a bushel and at not to exceed the market price at said times and places, except when wheat is being sold there and then at less than $1 a bushel, when he may pay $1 a bushel for said wheat if he deems best; and he shall not expend in said purchases any funds except those appropriated by Congress for the said purposes, except as herein otherwise specifically provided, and an initial appropriation of not to exceed $30,000,000 is hereby authorized, and the amount thus appropriated and all moneys received for the sale of wheat, except as herein specifically stated, shall constitute a revolving fund for the purchase, transportation, and storage of wheat, and for the insurance thereof.

The wheat he buys shall be stored in elevators under warehouse receipts.

The Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time sell wheat at not less than the market price in Minneapolis, Buffalo, Kansas City, Kans., Chicago, and New York City, as he shall deem to the best interests of the Nation.

Whenever wheat of the aforesaid grades and quality can not be bought in Chicago and New York City for less than $1.85 per bushel the Secretary of Agriculture shall proceed to sell as much of the wheat he holds in storage as he deems wise, at such prices as shall be considered proper by him, and so continue as in his judgment such sales shall be to the best interests of the Nation, and the funds so obtained shall be returned to the fund appropriated to make the purchases and shall thereafter be so used, as shall funds secured by the sale of wheat by the Secretary, or by the issuing of Treasury certificates of the United States as hereafter provided.

Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has accumulated and held in storage for 30 days 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, Treasury certificates may be issued, under such terms and conditions and of such amounts as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve, that shall equal the amount paid for that said 25,000,000 bushels, and with the proceeds the Secretary of Agriculture may proceed to purchase and store more wheat, subject to all the provisions hereof. From time to time the Secretary of Agriculture may sell from the wheat held under the warehouse receipts for the said 25,000,000 bushels as he shall deem best, and the proceeds of the sale of that particular wheat shall be deposited in a separate fund for the payment of the said Treasury certificates, which shall be paid, when due, from the money received for the said 25,000,000 bushels, and from time to time as other 25,000,000 bushels are purchased and stored the process may be repeated by the Secretary of Agriculture, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but a separate account shall be kept of the money received from the sale of each set of Treasury certificates and of the wheat bought therewith and of the proceeds of the sale of the 25,000,000 bushels on which the said set of Treasury certificates were issued, and if the proceeds of said sales do not furnish enough money to pay off the said set of certificates the money to do so may, if necessary, be taken from the revolving fund.

The President of the United States shall appoint, for a term of four years and subject to removal by him, an officer in the Department of Agriculture, to be known as the superintendent of grain and bread, at a salary of $7,000 a year, who shall maintain in Washington an office as his headquarters, employing, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, such assistants in said headquarters and such agents for the purchase and sale of wheat as shall be appropriated for.

Subject to the provisions hereof, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and shall enforce suitable regulations for the exercise of the powers and the performance of the duties hereby authorized.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. How much time is there left now?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Colorado has 30 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Virginia has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think we want any more time on this side.

Mr. SLEMP. Then, if it is agreeable, will the gentleman yield five minutes out of his time?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I generally agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], but I am a little surprised at the tangent he struck this morning. Even taking that tangent I think the gentleman ought to be careful about his facts. It is true that when we took over the railroads during the war we did guarantee while operating them a small return, and when we returned them to their owners we did for a very brief period guarantee a small return, but we have not since guaranteed the railroads anything or any return.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will yield, I entirely agree with that statement, and that is what I intended to say. I know we were for a few months, but have long since stopped.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not know but what the gentleman had fallen into the error that some folks who are not so well informed have fallen into. I am glad I was mistaken. The gentleman said we should stop talking about being opposed to the Government going into business. Well, I think opposition to the Government going into business is a very sound position to take. But while we are opposed, by and large and in the main, to the Government's engaging in business, there are certain lines of service, of public service that are more or less in the nature of monopolies, the Government may properly, so far as experience may justify, engage in. The Post Office Department is illustrative of that sort of thing. We have established a monopoly there—it seemed necessary to do it, and we are performing that particular service quite well. It is not business in the ordinary accepted sense of the term, the broader sense of the term, but the gentleman from Kansas started from the premise that we have embarked on this public service under public auspices and then suggests that we should make an effort to guarantee the value of commodities, and he refers to it as the Government "going into business." That would not be business, it would be foolishness.

Mr. LITTLE. That was not my plan at all. I was endeavoring to avoid the Government going into business by my plan, and by it we make no guaranty and fix no price.

Mr. MONDELL. If the Government, with a view of maintaining prices of commodities, were to start in buying up so-called surpluses—and just what constitutes a surplus nobody knows—the Government would have embarked upon a sea of trouble that would wreck the Government and everybody connected with it.

Mr. LITTLE. My bill endeavors to avoid that very thing.

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever the so-called surplus might be—churns or china bowls, pitchforks, toothpicks, or wheat—the principle is the same and the difficulties would be the same, the evils would be the same, and you would reap the same harvest of disaster in the end.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You would reach about the same result if you undertook to fix the price of coal, would you not?

Mr. MONDELL. The price of what?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Coal.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman evidently has in mind that by indirection we made it possible to place some moral restraint over the desire of the profiteers to unduly enhance the price of coal. The gentleman did not think that was justified. I think it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I just wanted to call it to the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming that as a matter of fact the extraordinary powers that we granted in the bill that we passed with reference to fixing the price of coal were never used. The action of the producers in refraining from increasing the price was voluntary.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think the legislation had a moral effect at any rate. It certainly served notice upon people who were inclined unduly to raise the price of coal that there was authority under which their ambition to secure undue and improper profits could be checked; and in passing I want to say that I think it would have been very proper to have exercised a little more authority under that law.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. My information was that the gentleman himself made a very fine speech against the fixing of the price of coal, and then cast his vote the other way. I thought the gentleman's argument was sound, but his vote was inconsistent with it.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I am against attempts at price fixing, and yet I think there are times when we are entirely justified in using the instrumentalities that we have at hand to restrain profiteers; and if that can be done without the direct attempt to do the impossible—that is, to fix prices—I think it was wise under conditions such as existed at the time we acted to do just what we did.

Now, I have only five minutes, Mr. Chairman, and I rose for the purpose of discussing the air mail service.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. But I have gotten into a colloquy upon other things.

Mr. LITTLE. I am sorry that my little speech diverted the leader from this important topic, but he has done me an injustice in discussing my bill without having acquired any knowledge of its contents.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not read the gentleman's bill, but I heard all of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. LITTLE. This is the first time in the experience I have had in the House when I have observed that the gentleman has undertaken to discuss a subject that he did not know anything about.

Mr. MONDELL. I heard all that the gentleman said, and if the bill that he refers to is along the line of the gentleman's suggestion I am not inclined to read it, because if I did read it and found the gentleman's name at the top of the bill I should be shocked, for I have great admiration for and confidence in him.

Mr. LITTLE. I said nothing about guaranteeing the price.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman's plan is to buy up "surpluses," whatever that may be, with a view of maintaining prices through the purchases of "surpluses." Well, almost everybody who is in business at one time or another has a surplus that he would like to have somebody take off his hands, and I believe if you started on that sort of thing you would have started on a long, long trail that would have many turnings and many pitfalls.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Like the gentleman from Wyoming, I have not read the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], but as I understand it from this discussion——

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I started in to talk about the air service. The gentleman from Oklahoma can make his speech in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. CARTER. I will try to obtain more time for the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. When am I going to be able to talk about the air service?

Mr. CARTER. I will get you a minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Be very brief, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. I will take half of that minute. The thing I wanted to say is that the bill of the gentleman from Kansas, as I understand it, proposes to stabilize the price of wheat by taking over a surplus of 30,000,000 bushels, at $1 a bushel, in order that the wheat farmer may not longer have to produce his crop at a loss.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not two? I see the gentleman's bid, and I raise him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Now, in the bill proposed and passed through this House by the gentleman's party, known as the ship subsidy bill, and I voted against that bill——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, if the gentleman is going to talk of the ship subsidy bill——

Mr. CARTER. Let me consume my half minute. You propose by that bill that we shall stabilize the shipping industry to the extent that the shipping people might not have to do business at a loss. Now, what is the difference in principle between the bill of the gentleman from Kansas to guarantee the farmer against doing business at a loss and the ship subsidy bill, which proposes to guarantee the shipping industry against doing business at a loss?

Mr. MONDELL. No. We endeavor to make it possible to transport American products under the American flag. That is a needed service. We propose to make it possible to perform it.

Now, I have just a minute, and I would like about two minutes in which to talk about the air service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have three or four minutes to talk about the air service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. In the gentleman's discussion with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] a while ago the fact was brought out that the authority given was not used.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it has been to a certain extent. I am quite confident of that. At least it has been used to the extent of moral suasion. That has been quite helpful and has done quite a bit of good.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was interested in what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] said about the air mail service. I entirely agree with him in his estimate of the value of that service and the importance of continuing it. It has been my privilege to come in contact with the men of this service, to associate with them, to know their work, to visit them at their stations, and become fairly well acquainted with what is done and with the way in which it is done. I have never believed—and I have been very frank in my statements in regard to that—that from the standpoint of the expedition of the mail, from that standpoint alone, this expenditure was justified. But from the viewpoint of the expedition of the mails and the development of the science of flying I think the expenditure has been fully justified, abundantly justified.

In the first place, we have established a corps of young birdmen who are an honor to the country. We have in this service a perfectly splendid class of young flyers who are very greatly devoted to their work. The record of the service is a remarkable one, a record of flying in all kinds of weather, entirely across the continent, a considerable portion of the way at very high altitudes and in regions subject to sudden and very severe storms. That service has been carried on without a single fatal accident and with but very few serious accidents. The service crosses a portion of my State, having an average altitude of about 6,500 feet and in a region which in the neighborhood of the mountains is subject to very sudden and severe storms. I have noted the service in that region particularly. It has been extraordinarily successful. The men have been courageous and daring and at the same time have exercised care and shown excellent judgment. They have carried the mails with very few accidents and with safety. The men in the service are anxious to try night flying. Both from the standpoint of the mail service and from the standpoint of national defense it is highly important that we shall have further experiments in night flying. No service that we could establish would, in my opinion, do so much to develop this class of flying, to work out its problems, as the air mail service. This service has been abundantly justified. It has been economically conducted; it has to a degree well worth while expedited the mails; but it will do very much more both in expediting the carrying of the mail and in the development of this science of flying if we can have experiments in night flying. [Applause.]

Mr. SLEMP. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] yields eight minutes to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I join in congratulating the Postmaster General, and the administration, and the country upon the good financial showing of the Post Office Department. When this administration came into power, when the fiscal year ended in June, 1921, it looked rather discouraging, because of the enormous difference between postal receipts and expenditures; but when it was noted that $76,000,000 of the disbursements for the preceding year were due to back pay to railroads, it put another aspect upon the case. The Interstate Commerce Commission under the law of 1916 had readjusted the rate of railway-mail pay so as to be retroactive to 1916, and that increase of $76,000,000 all came in one lump and had to be paid. The department reports that the deficit for the past fiscal year was about $60,000,000, a reduction of $20,000,000 from what it was a year ago, and the prospects are favorable for the accomplishment of that much to be desired result within a year or two of having this service self-sustaining. It is therefore well for the committee and the House to consider this question of finance and the sources of revenue if we are eventually to reach a self-sustaining position.

There are at present two measures pending before the Post Office Committee which would materially affect the revenues, and in favor of each one of these measures there is an organized propaganda of the most sinister character. One of these measures seeks to reduce the rate of postage on second-class mail matter, which would probably result in decreasing the revenues several millions per year.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Nine or ten million dollars a year.

Mr. STEENERSON. I stand corrected by the gentleman from Colorado. The other measure is for the so-called 1-cent drop-letter postage. That is sponsored by the One Cent Postal League. Fortunately, however, these two propagandas are antagonistic, so that one may to a certain extent counteract the other.

The main argument proposed by the second-class people is that the present second-class postage rate was the result of war-revenue taxation, and that they are paying part of the expenses of the war in the postage they pay. You would be surprised to see the names attached to the letters coming to members of the committee making that assertion. Now, the truth is that when the postage rates generally were raised it happened to be done in the revenue bill of 1917 reported by the Ways and Means Committee. The first part of that act provided for 1 cent additional postage on first-class letter mail and 1 cent extra on post cards, or 50 per cent increase on letters and 100 per cent increase on post cards.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would prefer to yield a little later. The last clause of the postage paragraph of the act, however, stated that the Postmaster General should estimate each month the amount of extra revenue so derived from first-class mail, and that the amount of that estimated additional revenue should be paid into the general fund of the Treasury, presumably to help defray the expenses of the war. But there never was one cent of the increased second-class rates paid into the Treasury for that purpose, nor did the law contemplate it. Therefore it is false to assert that second-class postage was imposed for the purpose of paying the expenses of the war.

The facts were that according to the figures of the department the cost of second-class mail was determined at 8 cents a pound and they were paying 1 cent a pound. So, according to these figures, the publishers availing themselves of the second-class mail privilege were paying one-eighth of the cost of handling and transporting their mail matter. Now the war revenue act increased the rate, so that on the reading matter contained in second-class mail it should be 1½ cents per pound flat for any distance, and zone rates were applied to the advertising part, and that took effect in four annual increases, the last one in 1921, of which they are now complaining and which they want to repeal. The whole controversy, therefore, involves the rate on advertising matter. That is the bill that is before the committee. The increases have taken effect and been enforced, and we are receiving something like $25,000,000 instead of $11,000,000, which we received at 1 cent a pound.

The argument has been made very strongly that the Post Office Department is losing some tonnage by reason of this high zone rate, it being 10 cents a pound to the farthest zone. I notice that the annual report of the Postmaster General says that the total weight of newspapers and periodicals carried as second-class matter during the fiscal year was 1,168,330,902 pounds, on which postage amounting to $25,140,259.53 was collected, which was a decrease of 5.49 per cent in the weight and 1.39 per cent in postage as compared with the preceding year.

Now, mind you, they lost 5½ per cent in round numbers in weight, but they lost only 1.39 per cent in postage. That shows that the mail matter that was taken out of the mails and transported by private conveyances was such mail as can be most cheaply transported. They have that privilege. The transportation of second-class matter is not a Government monopoly. Anybody can and does transport it, and they have availed themselves of that privilege where there was a long haul like that across the continent, where they could ship in bulk or carload lots and haul it just as cheaply as they can haul coal or wood. That is the kind of mail matter that they have taken out and sent by a cheap method of transportation. That accounts for the fact that the loss of revenue was one-fourth of what the revenue was for other matter on an average as shown by those figures.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Does the Government make or lose money on second-class mail matter at the present rate?

Mr. STEENERSON. They lose about $30,000,000, according to my best judgment. This last year, I should say, more than one-half—they still pay about 50 per cent of the expense—not of the advertising part, but taking all the second-class mail together. The figures here are interesting for another reason.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. The gentleman might explain something about the proportion of second-class mail as to the total volume of mail, and the amount paid by second-class mail in its relationship to the cost of the Postal Service.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would be glad if the gentleman would state it.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. It is generally conceded that at least 20 per cent of the service of the Post Office Department might properly be charged to second-class matter. This includes the handling and the hauling and transportation of mails over the railroads and rural routes and the distribution and delivery everywhere. Last year it cost $576,913,433 to run the Post Office Department. If second-class mail paid its proportion of the cost in running the Post Office Department, it might be charged with something more than $100,000,000. As a matter of fact, during the past fiscal year the receipts from second-class postage amounted to a total of $25,140,259, which, you see, is only about 4.35 per cent of the total expenditures by the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROUSE. What per cent was it before the additional rates were adopted?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Back in 1913, when the 1 cent a pound rate was charged, second-class matter paid $9,975,348, but the cost of running the Post Office Department was much less in those days, being only $262,220,491. So that year second class paid 3.80 per cent of the total expenditures.

In 1914 second class paid $10,253,255, as against a total expenditure of $284,812,980, or 3.60 per cent.

In 1918, the last year of the old flat rate, receipts from second-class postage were $11,717,633 and the total expenditures for the Post Office Department were $345,015,973, second class paying 3.40 per cent.

Of course, in recent years every item of cost in running the Post Office Department has been greatly increased. Because of increases in salaries alone the salary list has been recently increased $113,000,000 a year. So, even with the advances in postal rates, second-class matter is not paying much more of its proportion of the general Post Office expenditures than it did when on the lower rate of years ago.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think those figures are important because it all depends on how expensive it is to carry the different classes of mail. You can carry second-class mail cheaper than you can first-class mail. Some part of the second-class mail is just as expensive as first-class; it depends upon the number of packages in a pound. Some packages of second-class mail are small. Now, as I was saying, I have a circular signed by the Curtis Publishing Co., claiming that they are paying 250 to 300 per cent because of war taxes. They make more than a million a year on the service the Post Office gives them in circulating their publications—the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies' Home Journal, Country Gentleman, and many others.

Mr. William C. Edgar, of the Northwestern Miller, writes:

> The special or super taxes imposed upon some 10 other industries by the war revenue bill have either been taken off altogether or materially reduced. It is certainly not fair that the publishing industry should be singled out as the sole exception and be compelled to pay special war taxes five years after the close of the war.

These are only samples of the mendacity of these letters.

The publishers first proposed an investigation of the cost of the different classes of mail, but they wanted to reduce postage first and then investigate. Congress then proposed to carry on an inquiry by the department and the Joint Postal Commission and revise rates after the inquiry, but this the publishers have strenuously opposed. They remind us of the man who was brought into court and who seemed much distressed; and when a friend tried to console him by saying that he need not worry, as he would get justice there, replied: "Yes; and that is just what I don't want."

Some of the organs of the publishers have attacked the joint commission most bitterly and unfairly for no other conceivable reason than that they probably might aid in making public the truth in regard to this matter, which they dread and which would put a stop to their sinister propaganda.

Page 60 of the Postmaster General's last annual report shows that the postage collected on the advertising portions of second-class publications averaged 3.62 cents per pound, which is a good deal less than the actual cost of the service. The average on both reading matter and advertising portions was 2.46 cents less than half of the estimated cost to the Government. Second-class publishers are subject to criticism because they are seeking to influence public opinion and Congress by false pretenses. They are not now, and never have been, subjected to "war taxes" in the form of postage, and are paying a great deal less than it costs to render them the service they receive.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this one minute in order to read a telegram from the governor of my State bearing upon the discussion that we had yesterday on the increase of appropriation to make topographical maps. This has reference to land in my State, as fertile and rich and fair and as productive as the sun ever shone upon. The telegram is as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., December 29, 1922.

Congressman J. B. BUCHANAN,
Washington, D. C.:

While it is hard to forecast what the legislature will do in regard to the appropriation to make topographic surveys of Texas rivers, yet I feel I will be safe in stating that on basis mentioned by you Texas will appropriate $100,000.

PAT M. NEFF, Governor.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, whether or not this Government will properly function depends upon the confidence of the citizens of this Government in their public servants. No government can continue if faith and credit is lost in the honor of its public servants.

I listened with a great deal of interest this morning to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and while I do not always agree with him I agree with what he then said, that at the present time there is too much tendency in this country for the promulgation of groundless and unfounded charges against Members of the Congress of the United States.

In the last few days I have been looking over the precedents of the House of Representatives on the question of privilege and procedure. I think it is incumbent on the House to realize that on the dignity and faith and integrity of this body depends the proper functioning of this Government.

Back in February, 1867, Representative John Hill, of New Jersey, presented a preamble to this House which very fully and properly covers that matter, in which he stated—and the House passed the resolution with this preamble in it—that conduct of the Members in the discharge of their official duties and their integrity was of the utmost importance to the public; that that integrity ought not to be assailed except upon the gravest reasons.

The precedents of the House are full of evidences and occasions for the maintenance of the dignity of the House. Had I the time I should like to go over section 2637 of Hinds' Precedents, which deals with the rights and powers and duties and integrity of the House. The section bears out fully what the gentleman from Texas has said. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including section 2637, volume 3, Hinds' Precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

> 2637. The publication by a Member of alleged false and scandalous charges against the House and its Members, which he also reiterated in debate, was held to involve a question of privilege.
>
> The House took action as to a Member who reiterated on the floor certain published charges against the House, although other business had intervened.
> Instance wherein testimony taken before a committee and relating to the conduct of a Member was not reported to the House at once.

On July 29, 1892, Mr. Charles J. Boatner, of Louisiana, as a matter of privilege, submitted the following resolution, and demanded immediate consideration thereof, to wit:

Whereas on page 216 of a book purporting to have been written by Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, a Member of the House of Representatives, the following charge appears:

"Drunken Members have reeled about the aisles, a disgrace to the Republic. Drunken speakers have debated grave issues on the floor, and in the midst of maudlin ramblings have been heard to ask, 'Mr. Speaker, where was I at?'"; and

Whereas the publication of such charges if untrue is a grave wrong to this body, and if true the responsibility should be placed where it belongs; and

Whereas the said Watson has reiterated the same on the floor of the House: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House, That a committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to the House whether such charges are true; and, if untrue, whether the said Watson has violated the privileges of the House and their recommendations relative to the same; that said committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, to send for persons and papers, to swear witnesses, and to compel their attendance.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, submitted the question of order, whether, the House having failed to take action respecting the remarks of Mr. Watson at the time he reiterated the charges on the floor of the House and having passed to other business, it was not now too late to hold him to account therefor.

Mr. Louis E. Atkinson, of Pennsylvania, made the further point of order that the pending business before the House was a conference report, which was itself a matter of the highest privilege.

The Speaker held that the resolution submitted by Mr. Boatner presented a question of privilege, and that whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition he must entertain it in preference to any other business.

The Speaker also held that the pending business was the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 752, and that no conference report was pending. Both points of order were overruled.

On August 8, 1892, Mr. Boatner submitted the report of the select committee authorized by the adoption of the resolution, and of which he had been made chairman.

The report stated that the committee summoned Mr. Watson and such witnesses as he indicated, and very soon the fact was developed that the charge as to drunken speakers referred to Mr. J. E. Cobb, of Alabama. The committee thereupon went on and examined testimony as to Mr. Cobb, no point of order being made that the testimony implicating a Member should first be reported to the House.

The committee concluded that the charge was a libel upon the membership, and recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the charges made by Thomas E. Watson in his book against the House of Representatives, viz, 'that drunken Members have reeled about the aisles, a disgrace to the Republic,' and 'drunken Members have debated grave issues on the floor,' are not true and constitute an unwarranted assault upon the honor and dignity of the House, and that such publication has the unqualified disapproval of the House."

Mr. HILL. This House should be very jealous of its reputation. Any just and true attacks on the House as a whole or on its individual Members is a proper exercise of free speech, but we should, in the interest of good government, defend ourselves against unfounded charges.

Availing myself of the permission of the committee, I call especial attention to the following editorial from the Baltimore American, dealing with charges against Members of the House:

[From the Baltimore American, Saturday, December 30, 1922.]

Representative UPSHAW, of Georgia, who recently charged that the Volstead Act is being violated in high places, must have momentarily forgotten the existence of that indefatigable seeker of information, JOHN PHILIP HILL.

The charges of Mr. UPSHAW were well meant and amiable. The law was being violated by the very people who helped make it and who were supposed to help enforce it. Now, that very patently wasn't right. Accordingly Mr. UPSHAW pleaded with his erring brethren of high station to forsake their evil ways and to obey in spirit and in act the Constitution of the United States from the first sentence to the last amendment, not overlooking the last amendment but one. It was the plea of exhorter and not the warning of a detective.

But JOHN PHILIP HILL, who has a discouraging capacity for misconstruction, promptly misconstrued it. He will introduce a resolution, the reason for which is contained in the statement that—

"These charges are so serious a reflection on the whole membership of the House of Representatives that I am preparing and will file in a few days a resolution requiring Mr. UPSHAW to produce his evidence before the Judiciary Committee of the House, and requiring that committee, of which Mr. VOLSTEAD is chairman, to investigate Mr. UPSHAW's wholesale reflections on the integrity of the Members of Congress."

Now, Mr. UPSHAW had absolutely NO intention of starting any monkey business. Mr. BLANTON let that fact be positively known yesterday.

"You know," he said to Colonel HILL, "Mr. UPSHAW is not going to give away any of his colleagues even if he knew anything." The which was a surprising statement for a tried and true prohibitionist engaged in the fight for truth and beauty to make about another tried and true prohibitionist similarly engaged. Mr. UPSHAW'S concern for Volsteadism does not extend to the point of tattling. If wickedness flourishes under the dome of the Capitol, Mr. UPSHAW is willing to pray and beseech that it stop; but that's all.

These fine compunctions do not bother the rude Colonel HILL, who will try to put the matter up to Mr. VOLSTEAD, who is equipped with one of the most efficient senses of duty in all America.

The incident, with a "dry" charging liquor violations among Members of Congress, with a "wet" demanding proof, and with a "dry" backing off from furnishing proof because he is too "good a fellow" to offer it, constitutes one of the most humorful occasions in the history of what in some respects is the most amusing movement of all time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C.

SALARIES.

Office Postmaster General: Postmaster General, $12,000; chief clerk, including $500 as superintendent of buildings, $4,000; private secretary, $2,500; personnel officer or appointment clerk, $2,000; assistant to chief clerk, $2,000; confidential clerk to Postmaster General, $2,000; chairman, board of inspection, $2,000; chief inspector, $4,000; chief clerk to chief inspector, $2,000; purchasing agent, $4,000; chief clerk to purchasing agent, $2,000; solicitor, $5,000; assistant attorneys—1 $4,500, 1 $3,500, 2 at $2,750 each, 1 $2,500, 1 $2,000; bond examiner, $2,500; law clerk, $1,800; clerks—114 at $1,800 each, 170 at $1,600 each, 277 at $1,400 each, 354 at $1,200 each, 101 at $1,000 each, 10 at $900 each; skilled draftsmen—3 at $1,800 each, 8 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; map mounter, $1,200; assistant map mounter, $1,000; blue printer, $900; assistant blue printer, $840; telegrapher, $1,400; typewriter repairer, $1,200; 3 telephone switchboard operators, at $720 each; 6 messengers in charge of mails, at $900 each; 30 messengers, at $840 each; 15 assistant messengers, at $720 each; captain of the watch, $1,200; additional to three watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; 34 watchmen, at $720 each; 2 engineers, at $1,200 each; 9 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 2 blacksmiths or steam fitters, at $1,000 each; 3 oilers, at $840 each; 16 firemen, at $720 each; 18 elevator conductors, at $720 each; chief engineer, $1,600; assistant electricians—2 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; 2 dynamo tenders, at $900 each; carpenters—1 $1,600, 1 $1,200, 2 at $1,000 each; plasterer and mason, $1,200; awning maker, $1,000; painters—1 $1,200, 1 $1,000; plumbers—1 $1,200, 1 $1,000; laborers—foreman $900, assistant foreman $840, 2 at $840 each, 78 at $720 each, 4 at $660 each; female laborers—1 $540, 3 at $500 each, 7 at $480 each; 77 charwomen, at $240 each; actual and necessary expenses of the purchasing agent while traveling on business of the department, $500; in all, $1,713,740.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The discussion of the subject of the air mail service has suggested a matter that I want to call to the attention of the committee. I want to ask particularly if the committee has ever given any consideration, in connection with the air mail service, to the subject of providing life savers for the aviators who are employed in that service?

Mr. SLEMP. I do not think that matter was presented to the committee in that form. The theory of protecting human life seems to have been that the carriers have their own planes, and they are given only two hours and a half day service and the next day two hours and a half, and then they rest.

In the meantime he would examine his plane, and no apparatus of the kind the gentleman speaks of was mentioned. I think it would be legislation that would not perhaps come under our committee.

Mr. DENISON. I think the Committee on Appropriations would have ample authority to take care of such a matter without any additional legislation. I call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee, and the chairman of the full Committee on Appropriations as well, to the fact that there has been invented an aviator's life-saving apparatus. I know of at least one such invention, and there may be others. A gentleman in my district, Henry Morgan, of Marion, Ill., has invented a life-saving parachute, which he has presented to the Patent Office, and after their usual careful examination a patent has been issued to him. He is now making arrangements to secure patent rights in foreign countries.

This apparatus consists of a parachute which is connected by suitable supporting cords to the belt of a special suit of clothes that is made for the aviator; the parachute when folded up is attached to the back of his suit, something like a soldier's kit is attached to his back, and it does not interfere with his freedom of action; it is so manufactured and adjusted that if an emergency arises the aviator can by pulling a small spring located on his breast release the parachute, and since the parachute is permanently attached to his suit, it is bound to open as he falls and his life will be saved. Of course, it is as yet but an experiment, but the idea seems to me to be a good one. At least he has secured a patent upon it, and it has attracted a great deal of attention. It does seem to me that the Committee on Appropriations would be fully justified in making an investigation of this patent and if it seems practical these men who are doing this very important and hazardous work for the Government should be provided with every possible means of safety. A comparatively small appropriation would equip every mail aviator with one of these life-saving suits. If they would save one man's life the expense would be fully justified.

Mr. SLEMP. I would think that the Second Assistant Postmaster General would have the right to purchase that now under the item of supplies.

Mr. DENISON. I think he would if the committee would give him a sufficient amount.

Mr. SLEMP. The committee has given him a surplus, so far as the Air Mail Service is concerned.

Mr. DENISON. The invention seems to me to be ingenious and practical. The aviator is provided with the parachute in its proper place all of the time that he is in the machine, and it is so attached that when the parachute opens the strain falls on the belt of his suit; it is so placed as to not interfere with the aviator's work and can be opened instantaneously.

Mr. SLEMP. What does it cost?

Mr. DENISON. I am not able to state that, because it has not been manufactured for commercial purposes as yet.

Mr. SLEMP. There are only 40 pilots in the Air Mail Service, and if one knew what the cost was it would be easily figured.

Mr. DENISON. The inventor, Mr. Morgan, told me that he had not as yet made arrangements for the manufacture, having only recently obtained the patent; but it would seem to me that not only the Post Office Department but the Army and the Navy Departments ought to investigate this subject and provide for the manufacture of at least enough of these life-saving suits to equip every aviator in the Government service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman if there has ever been an accident where the aviator has been separated from his machine while in the air?

Mr. DENISON. I am sure there has been. The former mayor of New York City, Mr. Mitchel, during the war was completely separated from his machine when the machine fell. He was found some distance from the machine. It is a very easy matter for the aviator to disengage himself from the machine, unless, of course, he happens to be strapped to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it possible for every aviator in the air to separate himself at will from the machine?

Mr. DENISON. I do not say that it is in every instance, but where the aviator sees that he can not prevent a crash he can, I think, in most instances jump from the machine and disengage himself, and by operating this little spring attached to the breast of his suit, which is always accessible and which he could reach even while falling, he would in all probability be able to save his life. If that can be done, it seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations ought to make a sufficient appropriation for the Second Assistant Postmaster General to provide this apparatus for every man in the Government mail service. I am sure the Government could easily make satisfactory arrangements with the inventor and could itself manufacture enough of these life-saving suits for all Government aviators, and, too, at a very small cost. I hope the committee will at least investigate this subject before the next appropriation bill is reported.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Awhile ago I was about to speak of another propaganda being carried on—that is, the so-called 1-cent "drop" letter proposition—that might adversely affect the revenues of the Post Office Department. Many such propaganda letters have been mailed by Members of Congress to me requesting me to answer. In these letters it is alleged that it costs one-quarter of a cent to distribute drop letters. That is a misrepresentation. It is a false representation when applied to this bill or to this proposition. In order that the gentlemen may appreciate that, I call their attention to the meaning of "drop" letters in the Postal Laws and Regulations. A drop letter as described in the Postal Laws and Regulations is a letter mailed for local delivery at a post office not having city delivery service—in other words, the mailer of the letter drops it in the post office and the addressee calls at the post office for the mail. Such letters are mailed at the rate of 1 cent per ounce when sealed. But as it is proposed they want to apply 1-cent postage to letters to be delivered within the delivery jurisdiction of the particular post office where it is mailed. In other words, take, for instance, the city of Boston, with a postal district of something like 20 miles, with half a dozen cities in it. There a drop letter under this proposed law would be collected by the mail carriers and delivered to the post office, placed on the facing table, and go through 12 or 13 different operations before it reached the addressee. Brooklyn is part of the City of New York, yet it has a separate post office. The people in that town under the new law would have to pay 2 cents, whereas all the rest of the city would pay 1 cent for their local letters. A great many similar illustrations could be found. The result would be that 1-cent rates would be forced for all, which would involve a deficit of $150,000,000 to be imposed upon the taxpayers. Any man who assumes that that work of collecting and delivering that sort of mail can be done for one-quarter of a cent each, as alleged, does not know what he is talking about or else he is willfully misrepresenting. It will cost more than 1 cent.

There is no profit now in the third-class mail, which consists largely of circulars or 1-cent letters. The Government has no monopoly of that kind of matter. There used to be a large number of companies delivering circulars that could have been mailed at 1-cent postage, but in late years they have quit, because they could not do it at a profit of 1 cent each. Hence all of these companies have gone out of business and it has been turned over to the Post Office.

The large stores, banks, and other large users of the mail have found that in most cases it costs more than 2 cents to deliver letters in their respective cities, and hence they now pay 2 cents postage. This "drop-letter" scheme would save them millions and would cost the Government more than thirty million per year at least. Here is the estimate of the Third Assistant Postmaster General:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, December 28, 1922.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: Referring to your inquiry as to what the decrease of postal revenue would be if the 1-cent drop-letter rate should be extended to letters deposited for local delivery at post offices having city or village letter carrier service, or for delivery by rural or star-route carriers to patrons of the office of mailing, to which the rate of 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof is now applicable, I have to say that there are no recent data available on which to base an estimate with respect to the effect of such change under existing conditions.

However, as stated in the letter of the department addressed to you under date of October 27, 1919, it was estimated that, using the postal revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, as a basis, there would have been a decrease in the revenues of approximately $28,000,000 if all drop letters had been subject to postage at the rate of 1 cent an ounce or fraction thereof during that year. If the postage from drop letters increased since the fiscal year 1919 in the same proportion as the postal revenues as a whole, the estimated decrease in revenue for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, would have been approximately $31,000,000 had the 1-cent drop-letter rate been uniformly applicable during that year.

Sincerely yours,

W. IRVING GLOVER,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

If these two legislative proposals should go through it would increase the postal deficit by at least $60,000,000, and in this way the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has contributed a good deal to the desired end of making the Postal Service self-sustaining.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is discussing a subject on which there seems to be some propaganda, is there not?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I am sure, and that is the reason I am discussing it. I think the gentleman himself and many other Congressmen have sent me letters they have received from these organizations, one from the One-cent Postal League and the second-class matter people. These letters asked for my views on the subject, and I am trying to give them now.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman interrupting the gentleman sent him a letter with the request that we may have the information.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thank the gentleman. I have had figured out the number of operations involved in handling this kind of mail mattter—that is, letters addressed to office of mailing as distinguished from drop letters—and I find it amounts to from 9 to 12 different operations before it gets to the addressee, as compared with but two operations when it is a drop letter within the meaning of the law. It is simply taking it out of the box inside of the rail at the post office and handing it out to the person calling for it or putting it in his box. That is the drop operation; there is no transportation involved, only two handlings; and that is the reason that that was limited to offices where there is no city delivery and no carriers. Whenever a post office gets rural delivery you must put 2 cents on your rural-delivery letter.

OPERATIONS OR HANDLINGS INVOLVED IN THE COLLECTION AND DELIVERY OF LETTERS FOR LOCAL DELIVERY AT POST OFFICES HAVING CITY DELIVERY SERVICE.

1. Collection from street letter box by letter carrier or collector.
2. Transportation to post office by letter carrier or collector.
3. Facing for postmarking after having been dumped on dumping table.
4. Postmarking and cancellation of stamps.
5. Separating city mail from outgoing mail.
6. Distribution by clerks to letter-carrier routes.
7. Routing or arranging for delivery by carriers before leaving post office.
8. Transportation by carriers from post office to routes. (By foot, street car, or trucks.)

9. Delivery to house or office of addressee by carrier.

The above shows the process of handling letters when the collection of the letter and the delivery is within the territory of the same post office (main office) or station.

When letters are collected from the territory of the main office or one of its stations and intended for delivery in the territory of another station three additional handlings are involved, and the processes are as follows:

1. Collection from street letter box by letter carrier or collector.
2. Transportation to post office by letter carrier or collector.
3. Facing for postmarking after having been dumped on dumping table.
4. Postmarking and cancellation of stamps.
5. Separating city mail from outgoing mail.
6. Distribution to station.
7. Tying out packages of letters for dispatch to station.
8. Transportation to station.
9. Distribution by clerks to letter-carrier routes.
10. Routing or arranging for delivery by carriers before leaving post office.
11. Transportation by carriers from post office to routes. (By foot, street car, or trucks.)
12. Delivery to house or office of addressee by carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. At Rockville, Md., for instance, a man who wants to mail a letter can do so under the drop-letter law because there are no letter carriers. Consequently he drops it himself in the drop in the post office, where it is put in the box that belongs to the addressee or in general-delivery box and handed to the person who calls for it, and that does not take any expense hardly at all. It may be possible that it could be done for a quarter of a cent per letter, but this proposition here involves an expense that certainly exceeds 1 cent. It is about the same as a letter destined for outside offices. Now, the investigation that was made in 1907, which is published in the annual report of the Postmaster General in 1909, gives the cost of each class of mail, states the work necessary, and shows that first-class mail matter costs the Government 50 cents a pound, and that the revenue therefrom is 84 cents a pound, estimating 45 letters to a pound, and most of them carry 2 cents, some of them, on account of the drop-letter business, carry 1, but an average of 84 cents per pound. If you cut the postage on first-class mail in two you will have 42 cents a pound. Now, when it cost 50 cents a pound to handle that class of mail and you only receive 42, you lose 8 cents a pound on all of those.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield further, what has led to the strength of the statement that if you decrease the postage you will increase the business and thereby make money?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, that reminds me of the old joke that used to be told about the clothier who said, "Well, I can sell this coat for $30, although it cost me $35, and I can do so because I sell so many." That is what the Government would do; if it did a large business it would lose 8 cents a pound, and the more business it does the worse off it would be.

Since 1907, when cost was ascertained, clerk and carrier pay has more than doubled, so that the cost figures I gave are below what it is to-day, while the revenue is the same.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. LOWREY. Perhaps I ought to know, but I do not, but is there any provision in this bill that makes either of the changes the gentleman is discussing? Does this bill propose——

Mr. STEENERSON. This appropriation bill? Not at all. I am discussing it because it bears on the revenue to be received from mail matter, which is an important thing when you consider appropriations. Now, I was discussing the result when you take off one-half the postage you lose 8 cents a pound. Another result would be that there would be practically no circular mail for delivery within the office. You would, of course, not send a circular for 1 cent if you could get first-class service. The first-class mail is always given special expedition, and they would dump all this circular mail in the cities that have local delivery within the postal district into the first class and you would have to employ thousands of extra mail clerks. Another thing: You would have to distinguish between that mail which goes out in two classes, which you would not otherwise do. It would dump all of this circular mail into the first-class channels. It would be very much the same as if it were first-class mail, or nearly the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to have the attention of the chairman for a moment. What will the deficiency for the fiscal year 1924 in the Post Office Department probably be?

Mr. SLEMP. Of course that depends upon the receipts next year. If the receipts next year are 9 per cent greater than this year and the service is conducted under the appropriations outlined in this bill there will be $1,000,000 surplus next year.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What is the deficiency this year?

Mr. SLEMP. Thirty-one million dollars, under the supposition that the increase of receipts this fiscal year over those of the last fiscal year will be 9 per cent and that the department will be able to conduct its affairs approximately upon the appropriation made last year.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then we have approximately a $31,000,000 deficiency for the current fiscal year?

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That will be paid out of the general fund of the Treasury?

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, at this point I wish to invite attention to a question of revenue legislation for the Postal Service in comparison with the appropriations and expenditures of that service. Thus far I have failed to find any valid reason for conducting a Postal Service and making a considerable portion of the payment for that service out of the general fund of the Treasury. Occasionally there has been a small surplus. Former Postmaster General Hitchcock had the surgeons perform an operation for appendicitis, and thus separated the Postal Department from the general fund of the Treasury for one year. Considerable comment ran upon that point. Occasionally there may have been subsequent operations for appendicitis to eliminate the Postal Service from the general fund of the Treasury. I want to suggest to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the advisability of bringing in revenue legislation that will make the Post Office Department absolutely self-sustaining every year.

Why should we be gathering in funds from customs, from income taxes, and from the general funds of the Treasury to pay a deficiency for the Postal Service? I believe that a brief reflection will show the advisability of drafting revenue legislation so that every branch of the Postal Service will be self-sustaining, and especially that the service as a whole will have a small surplus rather than an increasing deficiency from year to year.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The purpose which the gentleman has in mind is the purpose that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has had in mind for a long time. Of course, the only revenue we get in the Postal Service is from postage, and we do not like to attempt to increase the postage derived from any particular kind of mail without investigation, and therefore we have ordered an investigation of the amount of revenue derived from each class of mail. When we get that information we may have a basis upon which to act. If the revenues are not behind next year it will not be necessary to make any increase of postage, but we are trying to prevent these raiders on the Post Office Department that I have mentioned heretofore from getting their work in.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose to stop the raiding.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman has made a valuable observation. It is a form of subsidy, is it not?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. No. We are simply doing business through a Government department that is advertised to be self-sustaining and then paying a deficiency out of the general funds. If that is what the Senator means, I agree with him, but I am opposed to subsidies, as you are aware.

Mr. FESS. There is not any way of amending it except by either increasing the revenues or decreasing the cost. That is why I used the term "subsidy."

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am very grateful for the Senator's observation. [Applause.]

Now, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for 25 years and more we have been debating the question of a quarter of a cent or an eighth of a cent on this class of postage and then on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In all these years we have failed to bring out any practical result from the investigation. Why, these investigations have been just like the investigations carried on by the Civil Service Commission, investigate for two months and do nothing. If it takes them two months to accomplish nothing by an investigation, how long will it take them to accomplish something? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but he is discussing a very interesting subject, and perhaps we can prolong it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; maybe I can have a little more time.

Mr. BLACK. I will try to get more time for the gentleman. The gentleman minimizes the importance of these investigations. He is inaccurate as to the value of the postal investigations.

Formerly we had a commission headed by the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, which looked into the cost of carrying second-class mail matter, and some very valuable information was developed; information which has been used by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in sitting down to the consideration of bills like that introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and that introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], seeking to reduce the rates on second-class matter, which is now being carried at a loss, and which would be carried at a much greater loss if those two bills had passed. Now——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The gentleman is reducing my time.

Mr. BLACK. I will try to get more for the gentleman. I just want to emphasize this point: That the facts developed by the Hughes Commission have been very valuable in dealing with this second-class postage question.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am very glad to have that statement, Mr. Chairman, but I am still wondering where it is reflected in actual revenues to the department, to eliminate this deficiency and give us an effective operation for appendicitis.

Mr. STEENERSON. It raised the revenue from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is good news, but still you have a $31,000,000 deficiency. We can point to an increase here and there from year to year. For 25 years we have had an increase here and an increase there, but in the round-up as a rule you have had a deficiency.

Mr. STEENERSON. But we have had to increase the compensation of the employees.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; but why did you not increase the revenues to meet it? That is what McAdoo did in regard to the railroad proposition. He increased the wages of the railroad employees and then failed to raise the rates to bring in the money necessary to pay the wages and the salaries. There is the story. I believe the fundamental defect in most of the postal legislation is a failure to enact a law to bring into the Treasury a sufficient amount of money to pay the running expenses of the department, and that is the point I want to emphasize to-day. If the gentleman from Minnesota, who is the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with all the wisdom and light that he has shed upon these great problems in years gone by—and, of course, he will return in due time—if the great giant of the North and West would stand here and lead America out to a self-sustaining Postal Service, we shall welcome his return here to the House of Representatives with the utmost cordiality. [Applause.]

According to this official table of receipts and disbursements the Post Office Department has been self-supporting only 7 years within a period of 64 years. The deficiencies have varied for the most part from $1,000,000 to $19,000,000 a year, making a total of approximately $340,000,000 for 57 years. That amount has been drawn from the general fund which is intended to care for all the expenses of the Government outside the Post Office Department. We should cease saying that the Post Office Department is self-sustaining until these deficiencies are wiped out. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully urge the imperative necessity of legislation that will secure for the postal fund adequate resources to pay the total expenses of that department. Until that is done the appropriations for the Post Office Department should be reduced at least to the point of self-support.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment. We have been hearing a great deal about the question of a self-supporting Postal Service. I have always been in favor of that and am in favor of it now. Yet, as my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has said, I have introduced a measure to cut down the second-class postal rates fixed by the war-revenue act of 1917. That war-revenue act came in from the Ways and Means Committee, and not from the Post Office Committee. It put an increase of some 500 per cent upon the rates for second-class mail. It provided for a zone system, dividing the country into eight zones and imposing a rate of 10 cents a pound to the eighth zone. That is the rate fixed on the advertising matter, and putting it altogether, half reading and half advertising, makes an increase of about 500 per cent. I introduced a bill to reduce it by half—in other words, to make the rates half that fixed in that law. We have had hearings before the committee and the committee has postponed action until the postal commission, which we have heard so much about, can report, which is a most indefinite matter. Now, I contend the reduction of second-class rates does not necessarily mean a reduction in revenues. It may mean an increase in receipts. I showed before the committee that last year, while these high rates were in operation in one city alone, there were 80,000,000 pounds of second-class matter taken out of the mails and transported otherwise, and in New York there was a great loss. It ran to a very high figure for the second-class mail matter which was taken out, because the postal rate is twice as high as the express rate and the freight rate is scarcely to be compared to the postal rate.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I should like to inquire with reference to the bill the gentleman refers to. What prospect is there of that bill coming before the House?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sorry to say that the Post Office Committee have postponed action until the Postal Commission shall report, and I fear it never will report. The Postal Commission has been working for the last two years and has not found any facts about the cost of transporting this class of mail, and is not going to find out anything, you may be sure, during the life of that commission.

But my point is that this action should be taken as a business matter. The gentleman from Minnesota talks about the man who sold suits of clothes below cost and could sell them so because he sold so many of them. That may be jocular, but that is not the problem here. The problem is that we have a fixed expense. We have a certain overhead, and if we handle more second-class mail it does not mean that there is going to be any additional overhead. If we cut out all the second-class mail, it does not mean that there is going to be any great cutting down of the overhead. We are not going to reduce greatly the number of postmasters or clerks or carriers if we take out every pound of second-class mail matter.

Just think for a moment. That 80,000,000 pounds of second-class matter means 1,900 carloads of 42,000 pounds each. To get one of these loaded cars to the fourth zone costs the Post Office Department $221, but the publisher pays $1,361 at present rates. The 1,900 cars cost the Post Office Department $419,900, but the publishers must pay the immense sum of $2,593,500.

This same mail matter can be sent to the fourth zone by express for 1½ cents a pound, or at a total cost of $1,200,000. There is a clear saving to the users of the express company over the Postal Service of more than $1,300,000.

But the outstanding fact is that the present postal rates on second-class matter mean a profit in transportation costs on this amount to the fourth zone of more than $2,000,000. Every dollar of that possible profit was lost to the department because the excessive rates made it folly to use the Postal Service.

It was said that there would be an expense in distribution. I admit that there is a great expense in distribution above transportation cost, but I maintain that the fact that this mail matter has to be distributed does not add materially to the total cost of the service and that taking it out does not decrease the cost to any great degree. It is a question of increasing the revenue. The overhead is there, and if you can bring the volume of business up to the full capacity, you do not add to the expense any more than you add to the expense of a water company or of a railroad company which already has complete equipment. It does not add much to the expense to the railroad company to run a locomotive another mile. If you have to add to the general plant to handle traffic, then you do increase the cost. Therefore it seems to me it is common sense to say that if you can get this business back where it ought to be, in the mails, you are not going to lose money, but you will make money. The fact is we have fixed these rates so high that the business is greatly decreased. There has been a decrease in only one class of mail matter in the past year, and that is second-class. There has been an increase in every other class of mail matter. The rates on second-class matter are too high to hold the business. I figure that if we cut the second-class rates in two there would be a reduction of $9,000,000 in the revenue, on the same weight, but that would be made up again by bringing back the amount of mail matter that is now taken out. I believe that can be proven to the satisfaction of any man who really wants to go into it. So it is not really a question of losing more money the more second-class mail we carry. It is really a matter of losing money because we are taking out a profitable part of the business, and I believe that can be proven to the satisfaction of anyone who will investigate the question impartially, aside from the fundamental American policy of diffusing information through publications at low rates.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I used to be a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and while I was a member of that committee we had under consideration at two or three different times this question of rates on second-class matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] makes a very ingenious argument by citing one instance of some paper published at one place and carried to the most distant zone at a good deal higher rate than express, and hence that paper is not now using the mails. We can not base conclusions upon an isolated instance of that kind. In a service of this kind we have got to picture the whole service and the whole amount of mail matter carried in order to get a true picture of the situation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] suggested an idea that led me to the thought that his plan suggested the idea of buying an excursion ticket at reduced rates in order to pay $50 excess to get back home.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the gentleman for the illustration. Now, the truth of the matter is that the Hughes Commission, to which I referred in reply to a statement of the gentleman from Nebraska a few moments ago, made a very exhaustive investigation of how much it cost to transport and deliver second-class mail matter; not just to take up one instance and find out how much that cost, but taking the whole amount of second-class mail matter and figuring how far the average piece of mail matter traveled and how much the average piece of second-class mail matter weighed and how many times it was handled, and figuring all of that, the commission found that the cost of transporting and delivering was 5½ cents a pound. There were certain expenses which were not allocated.

The Post Office Department, taking the Hughes Commission finding as a basis and adding to it those expenses which were not allocated, found, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] very correctly stated, that it cost about 8 cents a pound to carry this matter. Now, it may well be that, notwithstanding the increases in salaries of various postal employees and the increases in the salaries of postmasters, other economies have cut down the cost of this transportation and handling to where it is now less than 8 cents a pound; in fact, I am satisfied it is some less than that. But certainly no one who is informed as to the situation will contend that the present revenue that we are collecting from this source, which, I think, is something more than $30,000,000 per annum, is equal to the cost of carrying this second-class mail matter.

Now, another thing must be remembered, and that is that all the reading matter that goes to make up the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies Home Journal and other magazines is carried at 1½ cents to every zone. This reading matter is not regulated on the zone basis. The only thing regulated on the zone basis is the advertising matter. I think anyone will admit that when we take into consideration the fact that a page of advertising in the Saturday Evening Post costs several thousand dollars and a page in the Ladies Home Journal, in the advertising department, costs also several thousand dollars, I think all will admit that such charges are purely commercial transactions and that there is no reason why mail matter of that kind should be carried at a loss. I have no fight to make on the Saturday Evening Post or the Ladies Home Journal. They are excellent publications. I merely cite them as instances of the operation of the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the zone proposition which regulates the cost of the transportation of newspapers and periodicals applies only to the advertising matter?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; it applies only to the advertising matter. The reading matter is carried at a flat rate, and to all zones the cost is the same, even to the most remote zone so far as the reading matter is concerned. It is only the advertising matter that is regulated on the zoning plan, and that is purely a commercial proposition. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] used the same argument as has been used by the propagandist—and I am not referring to him as a propagandist but his argument is the same—which is: The publishers insist that the zone rates were a war-revenue measure, that the rates were put on the publishers to pay part of the cost of the war. The gentleman from Minnesota very pertinently remarked in his speech this afternoon that the only real war-revenue provision in the bill, as far as postal affairs were concerned, was the 1 cent added to the rate on first-class matter, and the Postmaster General was required to estimate at the end of the year the additional revenue raised by that 1 cent addition to first-class matter and pay it into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Congress did not put upon him the duty to turn in the money raised from transportation of second-class matter. Why? Because everyone knew, the Ways and Means Committee knew, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads knew, that second-class matter was not paying the cost of its handling and therefore the Post Office Department ought to retain the revenue derived from it in its own department.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If it was not a war-revenue measure, why did the provision come from the Ways and Means Committee instead of the Post Office Committee of the House and Senate?

Mr. BLACK. It was a revenue measure. The Ways and Means Committee had in hand the matter of raising additional revenue sorely needed, and when it came to investigate the subject it found out that the Post Office Department was only receiving $11,000,000 for the transportation of a billion pounds of second-class mail and was losing from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 per annum, and the committee felt that it could not in good conscience levy on the taxpayers of the country additional taxes without making the publishers pay some part of this loss. So the Ways and Means Committee very properly provided for the present zone law. Another thing which shows clearly that it was not meant as a mere war measure is this: The law provided that the increases should go into effect in four annual increments. This was to give the publishers time and opportunity to adjust to the new rates. This very provision shows Congress meant it for no temporary affair.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Ways and Means Committee did not assume jurisdiction of the subject until the Post Office Committee themselves requested it. Let me say in that connection that the Post Office Committee had made investigations under the Postmaster General for 16 years and the Postmaster General for 16 years had recommended it. They asked us to take it into consideration in making up the war-revenue bill and we did it. Now, the publishers, in my judgment, are still failing to pay between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 of what it costs the Government to transport their mail.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Texas is correct when he says there was an agreement that the Ways and Means Committee should have jurisdiction. I was a member of the Post Office Committee and we agreed to it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In the Fifty-fourth Congress this question was emphasized again and again, and the war was simply the instrumentality that forced the condition that we could not force through the committee in Congress before.

Mr. BLACK. And should have been in operation for years before the law was finally adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

In making readjustments under the foregoing paragraph, the salary of any clerk in any class may be fixed by the Postmaster General at $100 below the salary fixed by law for such class and the unused portion of such salary shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not more than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class. The Postmaster General shall assign to the several bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia such number of the employees authorized in the foregoing paragraph as may be necessary to perform the work required therein; and he shall submit a statement showing such assignments and the number employed at the various salaries in the Budget following the estimates for salaries in the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if the Post Office Department made any request for an appropriation for ascertaining the cost of carrying the mail.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say that it was stated that that would cost the Government $830,000 but the work had to be done between now and the 1st of next July, and so it would not come into this bill but would have to be presented to the Appropriations Deficiency Committee inasmuch as this relates to expenditures for next year. The understanding is that they shall go to the Committee on Appropriations for a deficiency to carry on that work. They have spent $27,000 in getting forms and getting ready to make this investigation when the money is allowed. It will be up to the other committee to provide the money.

Mr. ROUSE. Being a member of that commission, I wanted to know the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the amount of expenses of that commission up to the 1st of December.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman something about the effect of the section just read. I observe that it permits the Postmaster General to fix the salary of any clerk at $100 below that fixed by the present law for his particular class, and as I understand it, it compels the Postmaster General in turn to raise the salary of some other clerk. Is that true?

Mr. SLEMP. That provision has been in the bill for some years. Last year on the floor of the House the language was so changed that the change would be limited to $100. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] brought that out last year. The language this year is as it was changed last year. There are about 1,400 employees in the department on the statutory roll.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It refers only to the employees in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SLEMP. In the Post Office Department, not in the field service. The Postmaster General, the First Assistant, and all of the assistants connected with the department say that gives them a slight leeway. Let us say a vacancy occurs in a $1,600 place. Instead of promoting a $1,400 man to the $1,600 place, they can promote a $1,400 man to a $1,500 place, and the $1,600 man to a $1,700 place. That leaves a leeway, which they say is very much in the interest of the department. They wanted more, but the committee did not yield on that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As a matter of fact, this ought to be a part of the law on pay.

Mr. SLEMP. It will be rectified when the classification bill becomes a law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office, First Assistant Postmaster General: First Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; division of post office service—superintendent $4,000, assistant superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,750; division of postmasters' appointments—superintendent $3,000, two assistant superintendents at $2,000 each; superintendent, division of dead letters, $2,500; chief, division of correspondence, $2,000; in all, $28,750.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This morning the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] in his usual very incisive way twitted the House leader on the very remarkable situation that exists now in our Nation. This is the situation: On August 18 last the President of the United States appeared in this Chamber and called attention to the great profiteering in coal and mentioned that he had no legal power to stop it. He said:

I recommend immediate provision for a temporary national coal agency with needed capital to purchase, sell, and distribute coal which is carried in interstate shipments.

He also mentioned that "it would be an instrumentality of guarding the public interests against extortion where private conscience is insensible to a public need." The Congress was very responsive. That was on August 18, and almost immediately the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, probably not on his own initiative, because the legislation, I take it, was abhorrent to his ideas, but because he was chairman, brought in a bill to the House, and before the month ended passed the bill—on August 31—by an overwhelming majority, creating this Federal Fuel Distributor at an initial appropriation and cost to the Government of $250,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Not so much as that, was it?

Mr. BLANTON. That was what was in the bill—$250,000—when it passed the House; and giving the President the right to proclaim whenever he thought the prices were extortionate such a situation to exist, and to control it, prices and distribution. What has happened? Just what the distinguished gentleman from Indiana called our attention to this morning. Not a thing has been done. Extortion continues. Prices are not controlled. Poor people can not get coal. September has passed, October and November have passed, and this is the end of December, and we find to-day the great city of New York with a supply of coal for only 48 hours, with coal at $16 a ton and upward. You can not get a ton of hard coal now unless you buy a ton of substitute with it, all at extortionate prices.

What could happen? I remember last winter when one of my boys was sick in college and I had to go to him to bring him home, we reached Washington at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, just 1 mile from the Pennsylvania Station, and we stayed at that one point within a mile of the depot for 12 hours trying to get the train through the snow to the depot where the people could be unloaded from the train. We were not unloaded until 4 o'clock in the morning. Suppose a snow comes like that all over this country. What could happen? Not a thing has been done, and the people all over the United States are looking to the Government. If an emergency existed in August, it existed in September, it existed in October, in November, and December; and if it was such a great emergency, why has there not been action taken?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I have just looked up the figures, and I find that the amount given to the Federal coal distributor was $150,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; that was the result of a change in conference; but I said that the bill which the gentleman brought into the House and passed embraced $250,000, and if he will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 31, 1922, he will see that it embraced $250,000, as I say. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] could have changed that in the committee before the bill was reported to the House if he had wanted to, if he had gone to the gentleman from Massachusetts and said that his committee was not going to allow them to have more than $150,000. He could have stopped it there; but the reduction in conference was a change of administration plans, which had in contemplation the whole $250,000. It was the joint action of the House and Senate conferees that did that, or it may have been changed by amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am sure, from my knowledge of the gentleman's frankness, that he would rather be right than otherwise.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. It was changed in the conference.

Mr. BLANTON. That is correct. But the gentleman's bill as it was brought in called for $250,000. There is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill as passed by the House on August 31, 1922, reads as follows, which I quote from the RECORD:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $250,000.

But you are getting me off the subject. That reduction of $100,000 was an afterthought and has no relation to my present discussion, which is nonregulation of coal prices.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. How does the gentleman know it was?

Mr. BLANTON. Because the administration bill as passed by the House called for $250,000 and it was later reduced to $150,000 in conference.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman must realize that there are times in life and procedure when certain things are used for the purpose of testing out the views of people.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that was just one of the kind of feelers that we are having abroad now?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning which the other distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts in another body spoke so eloquently yesterday—one of the feelers.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not talking about the gentlemen of yesterday——

Mr. BLANTON. We feel out the House just like we feel out the foreign nations of the world?

Mr. WINSLOW. Exactly, Mr. Chairman; we have to take gentlemen like himself into consideration and give him something rather inconsequential to play with in order to get to more important things. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman, then, is like the bureaus in the departments which when they want only $150,000 ask for $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will be able to read for a while. We have not read any of the bill, and gave gentlemen plenty of time for debate. We have not done a thing in connection with the bill, and we very much want to finish it to-day so that gentlemen can have a holiday.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the distinguished gentleman from Illinois want the Clerk to read? If so, the gentleman from Indiana will be glad to let the Clerk read, but he was in hopes that he might make a two-minute speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay a cash reward for any invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions for an improvement or economy in device, design, or process applicable to the Postal Service submitted by one or more employees of the Post Office Department or the Postal Service which shall be adopted for use and will clearly effect a material economy or increase efficiency, and for that purpose the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the sums so paid to employees in accordance with this act shall be in addition to their usual compensation: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $1,000 in any month or for any one invention or suggestion: Provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns: Provided furher, That this appropriation shall be available for no other purpose.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have received several letters since I have been in the House from rural letter carriers to the effect that they have been unable—and I suppose are unable now—to secure leather mail pouches for carrying the mail. They inform me that they are furnished with canvas pouches, but, especially in my section of the country, where we have a good deal of rainfall in the wintertime and where it is necessary to travel horseback a good deal of that time, they say it is practically impossible at times to keep the mails dry in those canvas pouches. It occurs to me that it would not be very much more expensive to furnish, especially for use in certain seasons of the year or localities, leather pouches instead of these canvas ones. I should like to ask if that has been considered by the committee, and, if so, whether any provision is made for them in this bill?

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I will say that during the war it was rather difficult to get leather, and since the war, since the present Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has been in charge, they entered into a contract last year for 11,000 of these leather bags. The contract was made at a very low rate. They have been delivered along during the year, I think, to the extent of about 25 per cent of the rural free delivery carriers' force. Of course, some are used in connection with the City Delivery Service, but this year an order for 15,000 more has been given, and that is carried in next year's bill, so within a short time I think the carriers in the gentleman's section and all over the country will be very well supplied. That is in addition to the bags they had on hand before. That amounts to 25,000 in two years.

Mr. RANKIN. Is that appropriation carried in this bill?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. That is what I wanted to ask.

Mr. SLEMP. This is under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. That will supply about 15,000.

Mr. RANKIN. About when does the gentleman from Virginia think those 15,000 extra leather bags will be ready for distribution?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say ready for distribution some time next July, because the contract has already been executed.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman says there is already a supply of 11,000?

Mr. SLEMP. The order for the 11,000 has already been executed.

Mr. RANKIN. And have they been distributed?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; ten thousand and something. Now, the department is so well pleased along the line of the gentleman's argument—it only cost about $3 a bag, which is about one-third of what it formerly cost—they were so well pleased that a contract was given for 15,000 more. The contract for the 11,000 has been made and delivered.

Mr. RANKIN. Delivered to the department or delivered to the carriers?

Mr. SLEMP. To the department as indicated in the appropriation bill, and——

Mr. RANKIN. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the information, because I intended to call this proposition to the attention of the committee, but I did not want to offer an amendment unnecessarily.

Mr. SLEMP. I feel sure the department is in a position to accommodate all the carriers that need them.

Mr. RANKIN. I am glad to receive the information, because if this provision had not been made I desired to offer an amendment to take care of it. These rural carriers have a very difficult time at the very best during the cold rainy season, and it seems to me that the Government ought to at least take this precaution to add to their comfort and convenience, especially when it can be done at a nominal cost, for I am sure the canvas pouches cost practically as much as the leather ones if the figures of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] are correct. Besides, the people on these routes are just as much entitled to have their mail protected from the rain as are the people in New York, where certain members of the committee are contending for a large appropriation for the maintenance of mailing tubes. The last correspondence I had with the Post Office Department about this matter they informed me that they had none of these leather pouches on hand, but I am glad to learn that they are at least making an effort to secure a supply, for I feel that they are badly needed by a great many of the men now engaged in carrying rural mail.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, including substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, $107,452,600.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee how this amount of $107,452,600, in line 17, page 11, for compensation of clerks and employees in first and second class post offices compares with the current appropriation?

Mr. SLEMP. One hundred and one million dollars.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is $800,000 less than the Budget estimate.

Mr. SLEMP. The appropriation is $750,000 less than the Budget estimate, but it is $7,450,000 over this year's appropriation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And the committee believes it to be adequate?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services, $4,250,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to substitute $4,750,000 in lieu of the amount named in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEENERSON: Page 11, line 10, strike out the figures "$4,250,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$4,750,000."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it stands admitted, I believe, in the hearings that there is no class of employees in the Government that gives so much for their money as the clerks in the third-class post offices. They work for a very small compensation, and they work long hours.

Now, two or three years ago, or two years ago, I think, the average from this lump sum; that is, this lump sum divided by the total number of third-class post offices, was about $450 per office. The third-class post offices have increased very greatly in number in the last few years, and if you take this total appropriation and divide it by the total number of post offices of that class you will find that it is about $375 for each office. This money has got to be distributed by the Postmaster General in some fair way so as to meet the requirements of each office, but if you give a total so small as this it will be impossible for him to allow to many of these offices as much as they ought to have. Then you compel the postmasters to pay more and more out of their own pockets, in some cases nearly half their salary.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The figure the gentleman has given is $450. What would be the average for the clerks in the third-class offices under the amendment offered?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is not to be expected that you will have a certain figure. Some offices might have $100 and others would have $500.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is a maximum, is there not?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; there is no maximum. I get that amount by dividing the total appropriation by the total number of offices.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is a law now providing a maximum, as I understand, that where a postmaster's salary is $1,000 the allowance for clerk hire is $450 as a maximum.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but in the operation of these offices there is a large fluctuation. One office may have a large business, and the minute it exceeds the business expected under a third-class office it falls into the second class, where they have civil-service employees at $1,800, and if you lack a few hundred dollars of the amount necessary to put the office in the second class you have $1,200 as the maximum for that office. I believe this allowance is an inadequate sum.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the amendment, the appropriation for this allowance 10 years ago was $1,330,000. Last year the appropriation was $4,000,000. Now there is a balance on hand in the Post Office Department of $160,000. That is to say, the department is not utilizing all of the $4,000,000 that was appropriated for this year, but there is a balance still of $160,000. Now, then, in addition to that we are giving an increase of $250,000, which is 6 per cent over this year's appropriation, or about 10 per cent over this year's expenditures, or it will be perhaps 10 per cent.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I think it is a decrease from the 1922 figures. For that year I believe it was $4,500,000.

Mr. SLEMP. They did not use up the $4,500,000 in 1922. In other words, in that remarkable work of the department for 1922 they kept their expenditures within the income of that year. But I am sure we are giving a 10 per cent increase in this for the coming year, an increase that will cover the demands of this part of the service, and an increase that is indorsed by the Budget and by the department.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. I do so simply to say that anyone who is familiar with it will have to agree with what the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. STEENERSON] has said, that this is one of the items that is very unscientifically calculated, to say the least. In 1920 the average allowance for clerk hire was $433. In 1921 it was $450, an increase of $17. In 1922 it was $429, and in 1923 it was $384.

Mr. SLEMP. That was not the figure for last year.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That surprises me, because I know there are postmasters who have endeavored in every way to secure an increase, and the Post Office Department has said they deserved it, but that they did not have the money.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is correct.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I want to tell you what the Postmaster General has said about this proposition. Postmaster General Work, in a letter to the convention of the National League of District Postmasters, held at San Francisco, Calif., September 18, 19, and 20, 1922, said:

There seems to be an impression more or less prevalent among third-class postmasters that the administration of the Post Office Department is deliberately withholding necessary clerk hire from them. This is erroneous. The cause does not lie with the Post Office Department, but rests with Congress in its failure to make sufficient appropriation. The law itself provides that the department may grant fixed allowances for clerk hire to third-class post offices when the salaries of the postmasters have reached certain figures. These allowances would be cheerfully and readily made to the postmasters by the present administration.

The law itself, upon investigation, is also found to be unscientific and unsatisfactory, compelling an unbusinesslike method of allotting clerk hire. If a third-class postmaster needs a clerk—as the law recognizes—he should get a proper allowance when the postal receipts of his office have grown to such proportions and when his business has increased to such an extent as to warrant additional help rather than on the present basis of the postmaster's salary. Another disadvantage of the present law is the amount allowed. In many instances the sum is too small to employ a competent clerk, and as a result the postmaster must take the money given him and through long-hour service get out the mails the best he can. To correct this condition, of course, Congress should change the law and provide both a sufficient allowance as well as a generous appropriation to meet the needs of the service.

You will notice that he makes strong recommendations and says that this present system is unsatisfactory.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us get a law to change the system, then.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I can not understand why there should be a reduction from the 1922 figures.

Mr. MADDEN. We have given them all they asked.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the Postmaster General. We have tried that out several times, and the only way upon which to base the clerk hire is on the compensation of the postmaster, and that is based on the amount of business he does; and that is as broad as it is long.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That has nothing to do with it. I hope the gentleman will not torpedo my argument for his amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not intend to.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It seems to me it is a ridiculous thing that when the law states that the maximum shall be $450 where the receipts are $1,000, and we never come anywhere near that, and that up to $2,200 the limit is $1,200, and we never reach that, yet when the postmaster gets a dollar over $2,200 he gets an $1,800 clerk.

Mr. SLEMP. That is a criticism of the law and does not affect us here.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It is unjust that a third-class postmaster has to go into his own pocket to pay for his clerk.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail, because we are in perfect accord with the Post Office Department as to the amount allowed. That is all I want to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEENERSON) there were—ayes 2, noes 17.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices, $13,276,000.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information in regard to this appropriation. I see the Budget recommended an appropriation of $14,500,000 for rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices, and the appropriation agreed upon by the committee seems to be reduced to $13,276,000.

I want to say in this connection that I have had several cases up with the department where it was desired that better quarters should be secured for post offices, and I have been met with the reply that the appropriations were not sufficient to warrant an increase in the amount of rental. Leases have expired in several instances, and suitable quarters can not be procured for the amount paid under the old lease. Yet this objection is made that they have not a sufficient amount in the appropriation to pay the additional expense of better quarters or to pay higher rental for the same quarters under a new lease.

I am glad to have the information given by the chairman, that the amount carried in this bill, according to information brought to the committee by the First Assistant Postmaster General in the hearings, would be adequate to meet all the needs of the department for increased amounts which will be required to meet the demands for additional quarters and equipment found to be necessary.

Mr. SLEMP. I should like to give the gentleman an analysis of these figures. In the first place, $500,000 of this estimate was in anticipation of a building being completed and rented in New York City, which was not done. That is to say, the contract was not entered into. So the amount we should consider here is not $14,500,000 but $14,000,000. That is, the New York building never having been constructed, that $500,000 estimate goes out.

This is one of the items where a small change was made in the figures submitted by the Budget. That is, the committee recommended $13,276,000 instead of $14,000,000; in other words, a decrease of $724,000 from the estimate. This is the way we did it: The annual rate of expenditure for this year is $11,750,000 for all the rented buildings in the Postal Service. The department will get through this year on that basis. That is the first point. The annual rate as of December 11, 1922, is $11,600,000. That is to say, if all the buildings connected with the Postal Service could be rented next year as they are rented to-day it would cost the Government $11,600,000. But 510 leases expire next year. The question is what allowance should be made for their renewal. Now, this year and last year give a fairly good test of what that should be. For the leases that expire next year we are allowing 100 per cent increase over present rentals, and that is 2½ per cent higher than the average of the renewals during this fiscal year. That takes care of the 510 leases that expire next year, upon the recommendation of the department that that will be sufficient.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The opinion of the committee is coincided in by the department, is it?

Mr. SLEMP. That was the opinion of the department. That is where we had to get our information, and there is no difference there.

Now, as to other items, there will be some new leases made between now and the 1st of July, which will operate on next year's expenses, and we treat those on a basis of 100 per cent increase also. There are also supposed to be between 200 and 300 new propositions next year—that is, extensions and entirely new propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. I should like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLEMP. Making this allowance for the 265 new leases that will be made before the 1st of July, we have given exactly what the department wants. When we get through adding all these up we have a surplus of $714,000.

Mr. MADDEN. You will have more than that.

Mr. SLEMP. As to the Chicago office they made the mistake of charging the Van Buren Street station entirely to this appropriation. Three-sevenths of that is carried under the Second Assistant Postmaster General for the terminal, and four-sevenths here.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. A portion of that station is being used by the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; and they pay three-sevenths of it, so there is another item of $300,000. So, taking the $500,000 at New York and the $300,000 chargeable to the Second Assistant Postmaster General, carried in another part of this bill, you get just about what the department wants. That pretty nearly accounts for the difference between the estimate and the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. It amounts to nearly $1,000,000.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It would seem that the department should be able to care for the cases I mentioned where an increase of only about 35 or 40 per cent is asked for the new leases over the amounts paid under the old leases.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. I do not know that it is good business to say this, but for every lease that expires next year we are allowing for a 100 per cent increase. That is the recommendation of the Post Office Department and the Budget.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There will be cases where the increases will be much more than that.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; 140 per cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Two or three hundred per cent in some cases, because 10 years ago some places were small towns, and those towns have grown so that now rents will have to be paid at city prices.

Mr. SLEMP. We are now paying about $500,000 for the 510 leases that expire next year and we expect to pay $1,000,000 for the renewals. As I have said, there will be 265 renewals between now and the beginning of the next fiscal year, and the others are covered by old contracts which will remain unchanged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I want just a few minutes in which to call attention to the fact that the vote just taken on the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] illustrates very forcibly the strength of Samson after he recovered himself from the arms of Delilah and found his locks shorn. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is chairman of the great Post Office Committee. But the Committee on Appropriations has robbed him of his former power. He ought to know more than anybody else about the needs of the Postal Service and especially the needs of third-class post offices, which serve the rural population of the country. This great bill, appropriating $584,614,191.50, is about $6,000,000 under the estimate of the Budget. Now the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Post Office Committee, who used to possess almost the same power that Samson once possessed, offers his amendment for increasing this paragraph for the third-class post-office service $500,000. That is less than one-tenth of the surplus margin permitted by the Budget estimate, yet by a vote of 2 to 17 he was overwhelmed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the committee. Out of a membership of 435 only 19 votes can be mustered on a meritorious proposition while passing this bill embracing $584,614,191.50.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. I am sure the gentleman understands that there is no dispute between the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. BLANTON. The only dispute between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Ohio on the subcommittee is to the recent tune of 2 to 17.

Mr. MURPHY. The dispute is between the gentleman from Minnesota and the Post Office Department as to the manner of administration.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we are to presume that the Post Office Department is not alive to the necessities of the rural post offices scattered all over the country that serve the rural population, but the gentleman from Minnesota has been home this summer, he has talked with the people who have to go one or two miles to the little post office to get their mail, and he knows something about the hardships they undergo, and he comes back fresh from those people imbued with the necessity of increasing this appropriation. But the administration sitting here in Washington whenever it thinks of the post-office service it thinks only of the magnificent buildings and five and six daily deliveries that serve the people in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and other big cities in the country. Well, I thought the gentleman from Ohio would sit down; he does not longer want to ask me any further question on that point. I am with the gentleman from Minnesota on this proposition, and I hope when the power does come back to him, when his locks have grown out, he will not in a fit of anger pull the temple down about our ears. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, City Delivery Service, $72,200,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult, in fact, it is almost impossible, for the Members of the House who are not members of the committees who handle these post-office matters to talk with much intelligence about them. We can judge of the conditions only by the things that we see and learn. In the city from which I come the postmaster has found it necessary to reduce the number of daily deliveries in the residential and business districts, so that the people are complaining about the service which they are getting from this department.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that if the gentleman is correct it is not because there is not money or men enough provided. It is because they have not administered the funds that were placed at their disposal.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am referring to the Chicago office.

Mr. MADDEN. I say the administration of the Postal Service have not administered the funds. It is not because they have not had the funds. We have provided the appropriation for the men. I think the gentleman is doing a great injustice to the Postal Service by his statement.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not finding fault with any particular branch of the department, but I do know that the number of deliveries has been reduced.

Mr. MADDEN. I come from Chicago. I do not know about the gentleman's district, but I have had no complaint in my district. I live in the same city the gentleman comes from.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman from Illinois state how many deliveries they receive now a day?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Two in a district which is both residential and business.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a good delivery.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is not what they are accustomed to.

Of course, if it is going to be the policy that there shall be only two deliveries in the thickly settled districts there is no more argument to be made about it. I rose for the purpose of inquiring—and I trust there will be no objection to my making this inquiry—I rose for the purpose of making an inquiry whether anything has developed before the committee with reference to the delivery service for which we appropriate $72,000,000. Will this amount further curtail the deliveries or is it sufficient for an increase?

Mr. SLEMP. It is enough to provide for the number of carriers estimated for by the department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What was the amount carried last year?

Mr. SLEMP. It is a little over 3 per cent increase, whereas it was only $200,000 increase the year before.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it a fact that the business of the post office has increased 14 per cent?

Mr. SLEMP. No; not as much as that. For the calendar year 1922, as compared with the calendar year 1921, it is about the same. The Post Office Department held back $20,000,000 which they did not spend, and the postal revenue was about the same. For the fiscal year 1922 the increase is 4 per cent. Since the 1st of July there has been an amazing increase in receipts. That increase in the receipts has been absorbed by the Post Office Department in better organization, and that has been checked up by telegrams as late as December 16. I want to say that in 50 cities of the United States the service was being conducted up to date, even with the 20 or 25 per cent increase in postal service from 1922 to 1921, with the present force. The Post Office Department has now 462 clerks that they can appoint any time they choose from last year's money.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Have they been distributed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. They have appointed this year something like nine hundred and some odd.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am obliged to the gentleman for his information, and I am not disposed to provoke any difficulty here, but I want to say to my good friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman is criticizing the administration for not delivering the mail in his district as often as they ought to have delivered it, and he presumes to say that it is because they have not been given the money with which to appoint the carriers. I want to say in reply to that that they were allowed 1,400 carriers for the United States, and they have appointed all but 482. They are still authorized to appoint 482, and they are asking for 1,400 more for 1924. We are allowing them that, and that would give them 1,882, which they would have the right to appoint for the next fiscal year. We do not presume to administer the Post Office Department; that is for the Post Office authorities to do. All we presume to do in this bill is to say that the amount we give them is adequate to meet the needs according to the best evidence they furnish to us; and if the gentleman has any complaint to make about the service, the place to make it is in the Post Office Department. That is the answer I want to make to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say this: When I find the post-office service has been reduced in new growing sections of a large city—not in the territory where my good friend lives, but in the territory in which I live—and I am advised by the postal authorities that it is because of lack of funds——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the constant statement of the postal authorities in respect to every question asked is that the reason why they do not do this, that, or the other is that they have not got the money. That is the easiest answer to make, but it is not always true.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am trying to satisfy myself as to the adequacy of this appropriation. I have gotten some information now that I had not received before.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman had that information during the course of the general debate, because I then answered the same questions that he is asking now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But we are now specifically considering the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman had that information before we reached that point.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROUSE: Page 11, line 17, after the word "service," strike out the figures "$72,200,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$67,200,000."

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in consideration of the statement which the Postmaster General made some time ago regarding receptacles and door slots, to the effect that if receptacles and door slots were provided there would be a saving in this item of $5,333,000. This appropriation is $2,000,000 more than the appropriation for the current year, and allowing for the present year, and allowing for the thousand additional carriers that they expect to appoint, and the automatic promotions, this appropriation can be reduced, and in my time I ask that that portion of the Postmaster General's letter be read by the Clerk, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

About 35,000 carriers are engaged in the delivery of mail. The number of trips ranges from two to six, the average being about three. The average number of delivery stops on a residential route is approximately 300. It is reasonable to assume that each carrier will deliver mail to an average of 200 stops daily, and that the use of a mail receptacle will save him a quarter of a minute at each stop. On this basis the value of the additional service which may be rendered in the time saved is estimated at $5,355,000. The use of mail receptacles in the delivery of mail is not an experiment, but experience has shown that it is an advantage to the patron, and actually effects a saving of the carrier's time, which is usable in extending service.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Postmaster General said that these receptacles must be erected before the 1st of March next, and if they are this saving can go into effect in the next fiscal year. I hope my amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman must be having a little fun with himself. He wants to be facetious, I presume, because I am sure that he is not serious in offering the amendment. It might well be that if all these receptacles were placed on the houses throughout the United States a saving could be made, and undoubtedly it could, but we all know that they have not been placed there.

Mr. ROUSE. Did not the Postmaster General state that 60 per cent of the houses had been so equipped?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not remember what he said.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And the Postmaster General said that if we did not put them on the Post Office Department would not leave the mail.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, that order has been rescinded. It does not exist any longer.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was just extended until March 1.

Mr. MADDEN. It is rescinded for the time being. Of course, everybody knows that the Postmaster General has no such power, that he could not put the order into force, that the people of the United States are entitled to their mail, that they are entitled to have it delivered to their houses, and whether the post boxes or receptacles referred to in the order of the Postmaster General are installed or not the mail will be delivered, and there will be some authority somewhere to see to it that it is delivered if the Postmaster General declines to do so. So that I hope the gentleman's amendment will either be withdrawn or voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Very unfortunately for myself, and I think the House will appreciate its loss also, I was absent from the floor for a few minutes when lines 9 and 10, on page 11, were read:

For allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services, $4,250,000.

Mr. MADDEN. An amendment was offered to that to raise that amount $500,000 and was voted down.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I am very sorry that was voted down. I notice the bill carries an increase of $250,000 over the amount provided for the current year, but in my judgment that increase is not enough. Some gentlemen remarked that we have already gone over this, but I wish to have my say about it, even if some feeble remarks have been made in respect to it before this time. In almost every third-class office it is necessary for the postmaster to have help. The Post Office Department recognizes that; in fact, requires it. It recognizes it by providing some money to be used toward the payment of such service, but it is not enough, and it is necessary in almost every office for the postmaster to go down in his clothes and make up a considerable amount of money to be paid to one or more clerks. It is not fair; it is not right. In the first place, the salary of the postmaster is fixed at a figure that does not fully compensate him for his own services, and there is not a Member present who does not often find difficulty in getting just the kind of men he would like to have serve as postmasters in the lower grades. Especially is that true in the third-class offices, where the compensation is not attractive, and where, under the present method of doing business, it is necessary for the postmaster to pay out such a large portion of his salary for clerks. I regret that I was not here to help boost this amount.

It has been in my mind a great deal. I have seen a great deal of difficulty growing out of it, embarrassing to the postmasters, embarrassing to the clerks who have to put up with less than their services are worth, embarrassing to Members of Congress, and it is not fair on the part of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, there is one way to remedy that, and that is for the third-class post offices to have the salaries of clerks fixed on an annual basis. Then there will not be any further trouble about it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The postmasters do not do it; they get clerks——

Mr. MADDEN. Congress can do it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In these matters the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has much more influence than has any other Member, and if he is unable to do it——

Mr. MADDEN. But it is a matter of legislation and it must come from the Post Office Committee. We are appropriating money under the law as it exists. If you change the law we will appropriate under that. It is not up to us at all.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It seems to me that this subcommittee considering its appropriation bill could bring in some legislation and get it through in some way. It could put it across. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, like all other legislative committees of the House, has been shorn of its power, unsexed—I do not know what else to call it—but why does not the Committee on Appropriations take this up if the need is recognized?

Mr. MADDEN. We do not recognize the need of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that is very unfair for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that this is a matter of legislation. It is not. The law is all right that we have—had it for many years, long before the gentleman came to Congress. The system was based upon a lump sum in proportion to the salary of the postmaster. That is the old system, and we considered it when we revised the salary schedules in 1920. We came to the conclusion that that is the fairest way. The law is the deliberate judgment of both Houses of Congress. In regard to the proposition to increase this amount a half million dollars I only got two votes in favor of it. I heard the speech of the gentleman from Texas in my favor but he was not here to vote for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I did not vote against the amendment. I was right here.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman did not vote at all, and I only got two votes.

Mr. BLANTON. From the gentleman's line of argument I never was able to tell exactly what his amendment meant, and the vote came before I was able to tell what he was driving at, and I only found out when it was defeated that the gentleman had offered a very meritorious proposition. With the committee's majority of 17 to 2, my vote was futile.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If I had been here, the gentleman's vote would have been increased 50 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. I give notice that there may be opportunity to vote for this yet, because this is not final. There is a possibility I may offer a motion to recommit with an amendment containing this increase. It is the most important matter there is here. There is no fault with the law. The fault is that the appropriation is inadequate. The gentleman from Michigan has often received letters from the department when increased compensation for clerk hire is asked in these third-class offices and they say they can not give any more because Congress failed to appropriate enough. That is always the reason given.

Mr. THORPE. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member I want to make this statement. Along last spring I was talking to some postal clerks at Lincoln, Nebr., when seven were laid off, and upon investigation they were told there were not sufficient funds to carry them and pay them for their services.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is talking about some clerks we have not anything to do with. We refer to clerks in first and second class offices. These clerks in third-class offices have no fixed salary. They get $15, $25, and $50 per month. Assistant Postmaster General Bartlett said that the Government never had any employees and had not now any employees who gave so much for the money received as the clerks in the small post offices, working all hours of the day and night sometimes. The gentleman from Michigan is perfectly right, and I want to make it plain, and I hope they will vote for my amendment when an opportunity arises.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. To move to recommit the bill in order to place this increase in?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. But the trouble with the gentleman is that the Appropriations Committee has robbed him of all of the power he once exercised when he had appropriative power.

Mr. STEENERSON. All I can do is to make the offer, and in spite of the support of the gentleman from Texas I hope to win.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, and in communities adjacent to cities having city delivery, $1,500,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to change the figures at the end of the line to $1,700,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FESS: Page 11, line 26, strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,700,000."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make this amendment purely pro forma in order to make an observation, and I intend to withdraw the amendment after I make that observation. This is one of the last things that has been added to the Postal Service, showing the general expansion of the service. It seems to me that there is no activity of the Government that is more nearly universal, touching every citizen and every community, as the Postal Service does, and I think there is growing up in the country a conviction that it does not matter how much is the cost, that we ought to go ahead and do it whether it is self-supporting or not. I arose because I wanted to read a letter, which is a rather classical performance, that I received to-day on the subject of the Postal Service.

The letter complains of the practice whereby when a letter does not carry sufficient postage when it is put into the mail it will not be forwarded, but will be held up for more postage, and he says that that practice causes an immense amount of inconvenience and in many cases losses. Then he makes this very remarkable suggestion, and I read the letter just to show you the trend of public thought, that the Government needs to go on and do these things, no matter whether they cost something or not. "If the Government does it, why, what is the difference? It is ours anyway." It seems to me to be along the line of a growing tendency of thought, that it does not matter whether the Government runs at a loss or not, and in the way of public utilities, if they are running at a loss, it makes no difference, because the Government is doing it. This is a classical letter, written on a typewriter. It is not a "nut" that is writing it, but it is a fellow who really believes that he is making a genuine suggestion of value. He first starts in and says, "Kindly introduce a bill into the Senate." He should say "in the House"; he forgets where I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He means in the next Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. "Providing for the delivery of mail to its destination regardless of insufficient postage and the abolition of fancy red-tape methods now in use of collecting a few pennies for a benevolent Government which spends huge sums lavishly."

Then here is his suggestion, and you will note the language:

Though not having studied the matter intricately, it seems to me such a bill ought also provide a uniform charge of 1 cent for any ordinary daily newspaper (e. g., the Toledo Blade) wherever domestic rates apply, and a uniform charge of 2 cents for all sealed letters of anywhere near ordinary size and allowing for a very generous amount of overweight or overthickness; or removing postage charges entirely and restricting in other ways abuses, on the theory that letter writing and the use of the mails should be encouraged for its educational and entertainment value, assuming most letters to be welcome and a pleasure to the recipient, and representing on the part of the writer time and effort very honorably and profitably spent.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman tell us what business the author of that letter is in?

Mr. FESS. I have no idea. It comes from northwestern Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I was just wondering what kind of business he was in.

Mr. FESS. It is a typewritten letter. It is a sincere statement that the Government ought to do things, even if it is for nothing. It shows a trend of public thought.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HILL. I do so for the purpose of asking permission to include in my remarks made this morning a short editorial from the Baltimore American on the privileges of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including the matter mentioned by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the operation and maintenance of the airplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr., including necessary incidental expenses and employment of necessary personnel, $1,500,000; and in addition to this sum any unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1923 is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the few items in the bill that exceed the Budget estimate by adding an indefinite appropriation, whatever it may be—it is not disclosed in the bill—an unexpended balance. Has the gentleman from Virginia any figures on that? How do they know there is going to be an unexpended balance?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman that they estimate about $100,000 as the unexpended balance.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now I want to relate a little history concerning this air mail service. When it was first proposed to establish this service several Members of Congress from California and the mayor of San Francisco and the Second Assistant Postmaster General said it would not cost a cent, because the cost was going to be taken from the unexpended balance already appropriated for the Railway Mail Service. I said, "That is preposterous, that it will not cost anything. You can not make this committee swallow any such statement as that."

It turned out within a very few weeks or a very few months that a decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission was rendered as to the compensation of railways for carrying the mails, which created a deficit in the appropriation for the Second Assistant Postmaster General's office of $76,000,000, which had to be paid later on; so that if they had got their bill through at that time they would not have gotten anything. They misrepresented it. There was no unexpended balance.

Now it is only January, or it will be January on Monday, and only half the fiscal year has gone by, and they solemnly asked $1,900,000 in the last appropriation on the ground that they needed it. It was very urgent. In fact, they asked for more. Now they come in here and claim they will have an unexpended balance, six months before the end of the fiscal year, and they are going to use it for this enterprise.

Mr. SLEMP. I would like to say to the gentleman right there that they have reduced the personnel and reorganized the department—the air mail department—almost all the way through. Their supplies are not costing them so much as heretofore, and they are taking so much care of their planes that they will not cost so much, and they think they can pick up $100,000. They propose to run this same service next year for $1,000,000, a service that they are running for $1,900,000 this year.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is a new enterprise that they are going to establish, and of course there may be something in it, and I shall not set my judgment up against that of the rest of the Members of the House. It is subject to a point of order, but I will not make it. But it seems to me that a rule for one should be the rule for all. If this committee is going to abide by the Budget, why not abide by it in all things?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say that I submitted that question to the Budget officer, and he approved of this language.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no record of that. I have got to go by the record.

Mr. SLEMP. I say that for the information of the gentleman, that it was not done without the consent of the Budget officer.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman would not have the Committee on Appropriations completely abdicate and surrender all its authority and jurisdiction here, would he?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is unthinkable. The Committee on Appropriations never abdicates anything, but always grabs everything in sight. [Laughter.] That is what they have done here, and that is what the other subcommittee on appropriations did on the Indian bill. I offered a small amendment to that bill which would have saved the lives of sick people suffering up there on an Indian reservation—people who were helpless and needed assistance—and the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations stood here like a rock and refused to modify the language so as to make the appropriation available. Now, here we have the question of these clerks——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman observe that there is a cut from the Budget estimate of something like $5,000,000 on the total items of this bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. I heard somebody state that. I have not compared the figures. I have no doubt it is true, but that is not conclusive to my mind. I think there might be still more cutting; but on this item that we have been considering, about third-class clerk hire, the subcommittee have been absolutely adamant against all appeals for an increase.

Mr. MURPHY. Surely the gentleman does not want us to take literally what he is saying as an absolute fact when it has been stated on the floor here that the controversy is between the gentleman's committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the administrative department.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is an error. There is no trouble about the law.

Mr. MURPHY. It may be an error; but we do not like to have the gentleman make the statement that he has made.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman ought to know; but he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. MURPHY. He knows what the gentleman from Minnesota has said and what has been said in the hearings.

Mr. STEENERSON. I refuse to yield any more. I do not want any controversy. The chairman of the committee stated that it was the fault of the law, and that I deny. The law is the same as it has been for years. The allowance for clerk hire is based on the salary of the postmaster, and that is based on the receipts of the office, and no more fair or just or scientific basis of pay can be made. We can not make any better law than that.

The subcommittee have refused to allow a change in a single line so far. Here, however, when the air mail appropriation comes in they have violated the Budget estimate and put in perhaps $100,000 and perhaps $500,000 of unexpended balances before they know what the amount is. If that is good legislation, I want to know it.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if any part of this appropriation is to be used to pay for the erection of an airplane factory in Chicago?

Mr. SLEMP. No; not a dollar.

Mr. ROUSE. Where is the money coming from to pay for that?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman that that building has been erected. There was $1,900,000 appropriated last year for this service, and they found they could conduct the service for less money than that.

Mr. ROUSE. And they have taken it out of that appropriation?

Mr. SLEMP. They have taken it out of that appropriation. It was contemplated that that surplus would be used along those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, heat, fuel, telegraph, miscellaneous and office expenses, telephone service, and badges for railway postal clerks, and rental of space for terminal railway post offices for the distribution of mails when the furnishing of space for such distribution can not, under the Postal Laws and Regulations, properly be required of railroad companies without additional compensation, and for equipment and miscellaneous items necessary to terminal railway post offices, $930,000.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if his committee has made any investigation of sanitary conditions in any of these terminals, and especially in Washington?

Mr. SLEMP. The committee is not in a position to make any investigation of that kind.

Mr. ROUSE. I have received some complaints regarding the sanitary conditions in the terminal here.

Mr. SLEMP. I would like to say in that connection that the Postmaster General stated in the hearing that he was acting in coordination with the Public Health Service, and that the Public Health Service cooperated with the department in bringing about the very best conditions for the physical well-being of the employees and good conditions in these terminals. I think perhaps 50 or 60 of these terminals and post offices have the public health service already installed and in operation. That is an innovation within the last three months.

Mr. ROUSE. I have had several complaints, especially one in writing which I think should be called to the attention of Members, and especially to the attention of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29, 1922.

Hon. A. B. ROUSE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We are writing you because of our conversation we had and also because of your being a prominent member of the Post Roads Committee, and we feel that you can be of very material assistance to about 130 Railway Mail Service clerks, who certainly need and will appreciate any effort you may make on their behalf.

We desire to attract your attention to the Washington Terminal railway post office and acquaint you with its faults, failings, crowded condition, unhealthy atmosphere, location. We feel that we are well within our rights when we make and explain two contentions, viz, unhealthiness and crowded condition.

Location: In subbasement of Washington City post office, two floors below street and main floor level.

Fire hazard: Three dead walls with eight windows on one side so high up that a ladder would have to be used. One door leading to this room. One other door, which is kept constantly locked by order of supply division. This in addition to elevator.

Toilet facilities: Wholly inadequate to take care of the wants of about 130 men. Two toilets, two washbasins, one urinal. Clerks compelled to climb three flights of stairs to reach same, being so far removed from workroom that it affords a loafing place for many while on duty.

Lights: Artificial lights must be used for the 24 hours, and the present arrangement which carries the "juice" to us is carrying all that the switchboard will allow. Thus the possibility of a blow-out anytime.

Insanitary conditions: Entirely too hot, bad air, poor ventilation. Floor swept at times, but the crowded condition does not permit of a thorough cleaning. Along the ceiling of this room are carried the soil pipes that carry the refuse from the city post office to the sewers. Frequently the weather affects these pipes so that they throw out a "sweat" which drops on the work in the hand and on the heads of the clerks.

We are laying a great stress on the foregoing conditions, as from the standpoint of health we can find no argument, nor has any been presented, whereby we can come to the conclusion that this is a healthy place to work in. This place was evidently built in for a storeroom or junk shop. The figures will show that during two months this year we were compelled to give out 600 sick days.

Ours is an exacting service—one of speed, accuracy, and stamina—requiring one to be in the best possible physical condition in order to perform good service. With the Post Office Department viewing the humanizing of the service as a splendid thing, we also feel that they might be concerned with the health of their men.

Service: From the standpoint of good mail service very little can be said of the present location. We are so far below the level of the station that all mail that comes to us and mail dispatched by us must come through one lone freight elevator. Very frequently we are hampered in the use of this elevator, as we do not have the exclusive use of this elevator, it being used by the supply division, redemption division, registers, empty sacks, etc. Before this mail comes to us and after being worked it passes through the city post office and over a bridge to the station. According to season, this mounts to from 3,000 to 9,000 sacks per day. We firmly believe that the postmaster at Washington would be more than pleased were it possible for us to secure a location which would not interfere with the workings of his office.

We have just gone through a very trying Christmas mail, and had we not been given extra space from the redemption division, supply division, and the baggage room of the station, which was used for North Carolina and South Carolina and West Virginia, we would have been tied in such a knot we would not be able to extricate ourselves. Understand that this space was granted without cost.

We feel that for the health of the clerks and for the benefit of good mail service we are not now in a proper place to do justice to either. Mail increases from time to time, and along with that increase ought to come space and good conditions.

We are not unmindful of the busy days before you, but we are hopeful that you can lend some effort to securing us some relief.

Very respectfully,

———— ————.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $86,900,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask whether the committee inquired into the matter of the sufficiency of this appropriation to extend the Rural Free Delivery Service to the new routes, or is this just enough to maintain the present routes?

Mr. SLEMP. This item is an increase of $400,000 over the estimate submitted by the Budget officer, which was $86,500,000. This will take care of about 600 new rural free delivery routes more than what they now have, allowing about 130 for the remainder of this fiscal year and between 400 and 500 for the next year, which will be about the normal increase.

Mr. STEENERSON. My observation has been that this administration during the past year, at least, has been very liberal in extending new service and adding new routes.

Mr. SLEMP. Every single rural free delivery application before the department that has been investigated and approved has already been granted and the route installed, and not a single one is being held up.

Mr. STEENERSON. Where there are sufficient patrons to justify it, I think the Post Office Department has done very well.

Mr. SLEMP. Every one has been put in operation where it has been investigated and approved.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am a little afraid you have not appropriated enough money for this purpose for next year.

Mr. SLEMP. We have given them $400,000 more than they asked.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, at an annual rate of expenditure not in excess of $18,500 per mile of double line of tubes, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50: Provided, That the provisions not inconsistent herewith of the acts of April 21, 1902, and May 27, 1908, relating to the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, shall be applicable hereto.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the section on the ground that it is not authorized by law and that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And I make the additional point of order that it provides special legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The authority for this is granted under the laws of April 21, 1902, and May 27, 1908, relating to the transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices. These tubes were installed under the authority of those acts. We looked it up very carefully because I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that some of us were not very friendly to the installation of the tubes when it was proposed to install them. We looked up to see whether there was any law to authorize the installation, and we found that the law was specific as to the authority for the installation and we came under the law, except that the law provided a limit of $17,000 a mile. The committee reported in favor of installing the tubes at a rate of $17,000 a mile and the House increased it to $18,500 a mile.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky is clearly good. It must be remembered that these pneumatic tubes do not belong to the Government of the United States and were not constructed by it. Of course, if they had been they would have had to be constructed under authority of law, and the Post Office Department would unquestionably now have the right to continue to operate them. The section to which the point of order is made refers to the act of 1902, and I want to call attention to the language of that act:

And the Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts for a period not exceeding four years after publishing advertisements once a week for a period of six consecutive weeks in not less than five newspapers—

And so forth.

Now, it was recognized by the framers of that language which I have just quoted that the mere carrying of the appropriation in the bill then under consideration would not make it authority for it to be carried in some subsequent bill. So Congress gave the Postmaster General authority to make a four-year contract. It was not desired to enter upon a new service for just one year.

Mr. MADDEN. It was afterwards changed to 10 years.

Mr. BLACK. I was going to refer to that in a moment. At the expiration of the act of 1902 the act of 1908 was passed, to which reference was just made, and I will not take the time to read that act because it provides in substance the same thing as is provided in the act of 1902, except that it authorized the Postmaster General to make the contracts for a period of 10 years. That period has expired. It seems to me that no one can contend that the act of 1902, limited as it was for four years, is now the law. No one can contend that the act of 1908, limited as it was for 10 years, is now existing law. That is water which has gone over the wheel.

The only authority for starting this service again is carried in an appropriation bill for the current fiscal year. If the Chair will look at the language therein contained he will find that it does not authorize any contract for the future, but simply makes an appropriation to install this service for the current year. Now comes the committee with an appropriation in the present bill and repeats the language of the bill of last year, and I hold under the precedents of the House that the point of order is well taken.

It seems to me the proposition is virtually the same as the one in reference to the aircraft appropriation. The Post Office appropriation bill had carried an appropriation for the aircraft service for two or three years, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] made a point of order against the appropriation upon the ground that aircraft mail service was not authorized by existing law. It was contended in the debate upon that point of order—I recollect the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], who was then and now is chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—argued to the Chair that the appropriation was in order because it was a continuation of a public work. The Chair in sustaining the point of order makes the following statement, found on page 1584 of the RECORD, second session, Sixty-sixth Congress:

The point of order is made to the language beginning "Provided further," in line 20, down to and including the word "determine," in line 25, on page 14. The Chair finds on examination of the previous act that in 1917 the Postmaster General was authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of airplanes for experimental purposes, and furthermore, in the act of May 10, 1918, the Postmaster General, in his discretion, was authorized to require the payment of postage on mail carried by airplane at not exceeding 24 cents an ounce or fraction thereof.

Here is the meat of the decision:

The fact that the establishment of this particular class of service was provided for in an appropriation bill and may have been continued in another appropriation bill or the succeeding year would not, in the opinion of the Chair, be a sufficient justification for the claim that it would not be subject to a point of order, if the point of order be made. In the view of the Chair the Post Office Department is not authorized by any existing law to establish as a permanent class of service of carriage of mail by airplane. The commission to which the gentleman from Minnesota referred provided for the carrying of mail on all post routes, but that would not provide for carrying the mail through the air.

Now, the Chair sustained the point of order in that case on the ground that the existing law was not broad enough to include transportation by airplane, and that it was not a continuation of a "public work" merely because two or three appropriation bills had carried a similar appropriation for prior years.

That is the contention that we make on this point of order. Because the law of 1902 authorized the Postmaster General to enter into a contract for four years, and because in 1908 a similar law was passed authorizing him to enter into contracts for 10 years would not be authority for him to enter into a new contract at the present time.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Were these previous appropriations for this service for a temporary period, at the time subject to the point of order the same as this, and was the point of order made?

Mr. BLACK. No. For example, any appropriation made during the life of the act of 1908 would not have been subject to a point of order, because anyone making it would have been at once referred to the act of 1908.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Which came from another committee?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; from the legislative committee, which specifically authorized the Postmaster General to do the thing that he was doing; and the appropriation would therefore be in order.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas would not deny the fact that the contract pursuant to the act of 1902 has been entered into?

Mr. BLACK. But they have expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. It is a work in progress.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman would not contend that under the act of 1902 the Postmaster General entered into a contract for a longer period than for four years?

Mr. MADDEN. The contract was entered into within the last year.

Mr. BLACK. But that was entered into under the appropriation act, which was only for the current year.

Mr. MADDEN. Pursuant to the act of 1902.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; not at all; because it does not so recite.

Mr. MADDEN. And 1908 also.

Mr. BLACK. If the Chair will hear me also on the proviso, the proviso is clearly legislation upon an appropriation bill. There is no act now that governs the Postmaster General in the making of these contracts. The act of 1902 existed for only four years. The act of 1908 existed for 10 years. These acts went out of existence with the expiration of that period of time. This provision provides as an affirmative fact that these acts shall be reenacted and govern the provisions of contract made under the appropriation voted in the bill, except those provisions of the acts of 1902 and 1908 which conflict with the limitation of $18,500 a mile now carried in this bill. That would in effect be repealing the existing law of 1902 and 1908, which, if it does exist, limits the contract price to $17,500, and to repeal a law and increase the amount for service is new legislation. There can be no question about that. If the contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct, that the act of 1902 and the act of 1908 still govern, containing the limitation of $17,500, then unquestionably the proviso in this bill is new legislation, because it repeals the former limitation of $17,000 per mile and raises it to $18,500. In either event it seems to me the point of order will have to be sustained, because it is new legislation.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the Chair to a paragraph in the act of 1902, which I think the gentleman who has just taken his seat has probably overlooked. After making provision that the Postmaster General may enter into contracts we find the following:

That the Postmaster General shall not, prior to January 30, 1904, enter into contracts under the provisions of this act involving an annual expenditure in the aggregate in excess of $800,000, and that thereunder only such contracts shall be made as may from time to time be provided in the annual appropriation act for the Postal Service.

Contracts were to be limited to four years, but there was no limit of four years on the life of the law. Also, I call attention to the fact that the appropriation item pending in the present bill now before us is for the carrying out of the contract which was entered into for a period of 10 years, because in 1908 the 4-year period for contracts was extended so that the Postmaster General might make a contract for 10 years. The item now pending is an appropriation to carry out a contract already entered into for a period of 10 years and is in conformity with the act. The limitation of four years about which the gentleman has been speaking is a limitation upon the term for which the contract might be made, not a limitation at all upon the life of the law. That limitation of four years was changed by the act of 1908, which gave the Postmaster General authority to enter into a contract for 10 years, and in the language of the act of 1902—only such contracts as may from time to time be provided for in the annual appropriation act for the Postal Service.

So that if the appropriation act now pending provided for a new contract, that amount of legislation in the appropriation bill is already provided for in existing law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, just one more suggestion and I am through. If the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] is correct, there would not have been any necessity for enacting the law of 1908, which authorized the Postmaster General to contract for a period of 10 years.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The exact necessity for it was that the act of 1902 authorized that contracts should run for only four years. We found that was not enough, and in 1908 we made a change of law which authorized the Postmaster General to make contracts that would run for 10 years. That was the precise reason for passing the act of 1908.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the gentleman to contend that the provision of law which he read was a general provision and provided an indeterminate time for this service.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not for the service. It put a limit of four years on the time that the contract might be in effect, but there is no limit on the life of the law.

Mr. BLACK. Well, the contention that I make is that the law has to be read as a whole, and the fact it limits the authority to a four-year contract is conclusive evidence that it was the intent of the Congress that the authority should not extend any longer than four years. Now, I make this further point, if the Chair permits, that even if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] is right in his contention, nevertheless this paragraph is subject to the point of order because the proviso is clearly legislation. Now let me read the provision here in the law of 1902:

No contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tubes which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

The language in the present bill authorizes the Postmaster General to provide for $18,500 a mile, and further says that the provisions in this act of 1902 shall govern the Postmaster General in the making of all of these contracts except where it is inconsistent with the provisions of the language in the present bill. Now, of course, the inconsistency that it refers to is very clear, and that is the $17,000 limitation in the act of 1902 and it removes that limitation and makes a contract for $18,500 a mile permissible. Now, it seems to me that if the contention of these gentlemen is true, to the effect that the act of 1902 is still in existence, why, then, this bill would be clearly repealing a part of the language of the act of 1902, and to repeal part of a law is legislation. That is the contention that I make.

The CHAIRMAN. Do gentlemen care to be heard any further? The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair doubts whether it is necessary for the Chair to express his opinion on the first part of the section. It is plain to the mind of the Chair that the act of 1902 is still in existence, still a valid enactment. The Chair believes that the language, to which attention was called by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]— and thereafter only such contracts shall be made as from time to time are provided for in a new appropriation act for the Postal Service—is permanent law and makes it possible at any time for the Congress to exercise its discretion as to that particular subject matter. The Chair has looked at these other acts, and while that particular act provided for four-year contracts it was evident that at that time the Congress was of the opinion this was the period for which such contracts should properly extend. In the act of 1908 first an appropriation was made and then authority was given to extend contracts for periods of 10 years, and following in the act of 1916, in a similar portion of the act, an appropriation of $976,000 was made and the Postmaster General was authorized to extend existing contracts until March 4, 1917. There was some subsequent legislation on that subject; among other things a commission was appointed to investigate the matter and make report on or before March 4, 1918. But in every instance the Chair believes Congress was exercising a power that it still has; a power to make appropriations for the pneumatic-tube service under the original act of 1902, which has never been repealed, either expressly or by implication.

But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] urges the proposition that the proviso is legislation. The Chair thinks it is. The Chair can not escape the reasoning which the gentleman from Texas urges as to the proviso, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. It is the same paragraph without the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLEMP: Page 19, line 23, strike out: "For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, at an annual rate of expenditure not in excess of $18,500 per mile of double line of tubes, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. I understand the viewpoint of the Chair, as recently stated in the decision, and do not take issue with the Chair when he rules that a simple appropriation would be in order. But this limitation, which authorizes the Postmaster General to enter into contracts of $18,500 per mile, is a provision that would repeal the limitation in the law of 1902, which limits it to $17,000 per mile, and it would clearly be legislation, because if that amendment is passed then the Postmaster General would be permitted to go out and contract at $18,500 per mile instead of being limited to the present law, which requires not to exceed $17,000 per mile.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have no argument to present on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair is correctly advised, that the act of 1902 is permanent legislation, then the provision of that act applies. That provision is:

No contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

The Chair assumes that the kind of service that is to be rendered under this bill is the same kind of service as is mentioned in the section just read. If that is true, a limitation of $17,000 per mile is made by the substantive law. This bill makes a limit possible of $18,500. Surely that changes the law itself and is legislation. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLEMP: Page 19, after line 22, insert: "For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I just want to occupy a few minutes in discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP].

I am delighted that the Chair overruled the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. This ruling simplifies matters greatly.

I favor the pending amendment, because it provides for a pneumatic-tube system for New York City and furnishes a better postal service for the metropolis, which means better postal facilities for the entire country and, in a sense, for the whole world.

The voting of the appropriation provided by this amendment is a matter of absolute good faith and business integrity, since the contract for a pneumatic-tube service in New York has already been made, and a suitable appropriation to carry out the contract is absolutely necessary unless the Government is to default in its agreement.

Mr. Chairman, the discussions and dissensions of recent years on the floor of this House concerning pneumatic tubes have almost invariably been caused by the question of economy. It has rarely been denied that pneumatic tubes furnish a better and more expeditious service. It has simply been contended that the truck system furnishes a more economical way of moving mail in New York City. There seems to be no truth in this contention. Indeed, the very opposite seems true. Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that the system of truck transportation is more economical, it can not be reasonably denied that the small amount of money saved by the trucking of mail is inconsiderable, even insignificant, when compared with the decided advantage and the better service of the pneumatic-tube method. It is all very well to cultivate economy in the administration of public affairs, but it is not wise to destroy efficient government in the name of economy. There is such a thing as being penny-wise and pound-foolish.

What we need in New York City especially, and in the country generally, is a postal service which is characterized at once by safety, certainty, and speed. To secure such a service we can afford to expend a little extra money.

The longer I stay in this House, Mr. Chairman, the more respect I have for facts and figures and the less for declamation and rhetoric. I am coming to believe that an ounce of logic is worth a ton of eloquence. These considerations compel me to submit at once a statement of facts and figures, based upon reports of Postmaster Morgan of New York and of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Billany of the Government, demonstrating that the pneumatic-tube system is not only more expeditious but more economical as well. I respectfully request your careful consideration of the following statement of facts and figures:

The contract entered into with the New York Pneumatic Service Co. on October 2, 1922, after advertising for bids as provided by law, covers 27.41 miles of double tubes at $18,500 per mile—a total annual charge of $507,085.

Miles of double tubes placed in operation Oct. 2, 1922	16.5633
Miles of double tubes to be placed in operation Jan. 1, 1923	10.1567
Miles of double tubes to be placed in operation May 1, 1923	.69
Total	27.41

Size of containers, 6§ by 21 inches (inside measurements); capacity of containers, 550 average-size short letters or 400 mixed sizes, long and short.

Average number of average-size letters carried in a container during tube hours (4 a. m. to 11 p. m.), 200.

Number of postal points to be connected with tubes (2 of these are the main office at New York and the main office at Brooklyn)	25
Number of points connected with the tube system Oct. 2, 1922	16
Number of points to be connected with tube system Jan. 1, 1923	8
Number of points to be connected with tube system May 1, 1923	1
Total	25

Tests made November 14 and December 8 furnishes information as follows:

Number of letters originating at New York and Brooklyn	5,807,629
Number of letters received from outside points for local delivery at New York, including main office in Brooklyn	3,594,933
Grand total of letters handled in New York, including main office, Brooklyn	9,402,562

* * * * * * *

Letters handled by tubes (16,490 original containers of 200 letters each)	3,298,000
Letters transported by trucks	6,104,562
Grand total letters handled	9,402,562

* * * * * * *

Based on service performed by 60.43 per cent of tubes in operation, the number of letters handled by complete system will be	5,457,554

SAVING EFFECTED IN EXPENSE OF VEHICLE SERVICE.

Twenty-one trucks and forty-four chauffeurs have been released from duty since the reopening of 60.43 per cent of the tube system. The immediate saving is at the rate of $113,311. Ultimately this saving will amount to $131,898 a year.

* * * * * * *

The number of operations required in dispatching mail by tubes and by motor trucks is the same—12 each—and the time is approximately the same.

* * * * * * *

Seventeen thousand special-delivery letters are handled per day, nearly all of which are transmitted through the tube to the station nearest point of delivery. Since the establishment of tube service "specials" are collected from letter "drops" every 10 minutes instead of every 30 minutes, as was the case when motor-truck service was in operation.

REGISTERED MAIL DISPATCHED BY TUBES.

The percentage of registered mail dispatched from tube stations via pneumatic tubes varies from 25 to 94 per cent of the total number of registers handled, the percentage at the more important stations being as follows:

	Per cent.
General post office, New York	54
City Hall station	25
Grand Central station	80
Times Square station	60
Wall Street station	37

Closing time when transported by motor truck, 8.24 p. m.

Closing time—the time of dispatch of last tube container—8.36 p. m.

It is estimated that 500,000 letters per day are advanced in delivery as a result of operation of tubes.

These facts and figures, Mr. Chairman, speak more eloquently and convincingly than mere words. They prove beyond doubt the superior advantage of the tube system from the viewpoint of both economy and speed. Only a caviling critic, after considering them, remains unconvinced.

Nevertheless, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] talks about "the waste and extravagance connected with this proposition," and proclaims the shibboleth of sectionalism in a manner quite characteristic of his provincial statesmanship, or rather of his petty politics. He grows vehement in his denunciation of my advocacy of this amendment and can explain my attitude only on the ground, as he emphatically states, that I am a New York Representative and that the people of my district and of all New York favor the pending measure.

Quite naturally I favor what the people of my district and the people of New York desire. They have commmissioned me to represent them and their interests, as well as the interests of the whole country, and it is my duty to be faithful to the trust reposed. My primary duty is to them and their interests.

Nevertheless, I have refused and now refuse to conform my public conduct to narrow sectional lines or to strictly partisan demands. The Republic means more to me than any State, and the entire flag than any single star upon its folds.

I have no desire whatever, my colleagues, to enter upon a sectional controversy in this House, from which sectionalism should be forever banished. Nevertheless, facts should be stated and the truth should be told, if the heavens fall.

It can not be truthfully denied that there is now and has been for years a deep-set determination on the part of certain Representatives from the West and South to discriminate unfairly against the East in general and New York especially in the matter of taxation and expenditures. This determination is all the more unworthy since it insists upon placing upon the State of New York the chief burden of Federal taxation in general matters relating to the welfare of the Republic, and at the same time refuses to allow to the Empire State any trifling local advantage that may call for an outlay of a few hundred thousand dollars from the Federal Treasury. The spirit that prompts this determination is not only narrow and sectional but contemptible and short-sighted as well.

The records of the Treasury Department show that the single State of New York furnishes more than one-third (33⅓ per cent) of all Federal revenues for all purposes whatsoever. The Metropolitan district of New York is the chief contributor of the revenues needed to maintain the Agricultural Department whose benefits accrue chiefly to the rural sections of the country. New Yorkers are called upon to foot the bills when we appropriate moneys by the hundreds of millions in the various rivers and harbors schemes designed to irrigate Southern and Western streams, the greater number of which should be filled in, macacamized, and used as highways.

You gentlemen from the South and West never make any objection when we pay these bills uncomplainingly for you, but when we ask you to help create and maintain a pneumatic tube system that is of primary benefit to the people of New York, but is certainly also of great secondary benefit to the balance of the country, you raise the cry of sectionalism.

The ludicrous feature of the whole controversy is the contention that the pneumatic tube system calls for an expenditure of public money from the Federal Treasury for the benefit locally of New York City Nothing could be farther from the truth than this contention. The fact of the matter is that whatever benefits the people of New York City in an appropriation of this kind benefits the people of every State and of all the world.

Please do not forget, gentlemen of the House, that New York City is not local. Remember that it is in more ways than one—in its location by the sea, in the millions and character of its population, in magnitude of its municipal budget, in its strangely complex and varied branches of government, philanthropy, and charity, in its multitudinous phases of life—in all these ways New York City is both national and international.

From the farthest ends of the earth contributions have been made to the citizenship of New York. Every State of the American Union has contributed those among its bravest and best to the making of the population of this magnificent city by the sea. Your friends and relatives, my colleagues, and the friends and relatives of your constituents are residents and citizens of this great city, and whatever benefits the people of New York benefits those nearest and dearest to you and yours.

The statement which I have just submitted shows that on November 14, 1922, 9,402,562 letters were handled by the post office of Greater New York. Of these, 5,807,629 originated in New York and were sent to other points in the city or forwarded to places outside, to localities domestic or foreign. The remainder, numbering 3,594,933 letters, were received from points outside of New York.

Is it not reasonable, gentlemen of the House, to suppose that of these more than 3,000,000 letters that came from the outside on one day into New York City at least 2,000,000 of them were from people of the various States to friends, relatives, and business correspondents in the city? Is it not also reasonable to suppose that of the 5,807,629 that originated in New York City, at least 2,000,000 were answers to letters coming from the States? Then is it not also mathematically correct to say that 4,000,000 letters a day approximately represent the medium of postal exchange in matters of friendship, love, and business between citizens of the States and of the metropolis of the Republic?

If these various suppositions are true, what ground is there for sectional controversy in this House with reference to the establishment of a pneumatic tube service for New York City, in which facts and figures show with almost mathematical exactness that all the people of our country have a common interest?

My final plea to you, my colleagues, is to stifle party prejudice, destroy sectional bias, be patriots and statesmen, and pass this amendment without delay.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not see how any Member of Congress who has read the minority report of our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] on this subject could vote for this amendment.

Of course, I realize the present excruciating necessity of our friend from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] getting this amendment through. I know what it means to him. I would be the last man to stand in the way of his coming back. I know that it would be the open sesame to him back into the halls of Congress, because New York voters, Republicans and Democrats alike, vote for the man who can bring home the bacon, and this amendment is bringing home the bacon for New York.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. If the gentleman will take my word for it I will say that if he will look in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of former years he will find that when I was not immediately a candidate I favored the same thing, and the gentleman ought to retract his ungenerous suggestion of political ambitions.

Mr. BLANTON. If it did not take all this money out of the Treasury I would not object to it.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I have been consistently in favor of the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. BLANTON. Sure; because the gentleman is a New Yorker, and he could not be a New Yorker without being consistently for this amendment; but I am going back to the minority report written by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE]. Read it and you will see where United States mail has been lost in these tubes for I do not know how long before it was found.

Read all about the waste and extravagance connected with this proposition. And we can not forget the expensive lobby that was maintained here all through the year 1918 trying to push this over again onto the American people. We can not forget that, and the gentleman from New York does not forget it. We remember the contest here in the House. I remember that it was argued here pro and con, and when it came to a vote it was a tie, so many for and an equal number against, and our late lamented good friend who was then presiding, and who always resolved a doubt in favor of a measure, voted in the affirmative and broke the tie, and that is the way it was carried. But I say we ought not to put it again into this bill here on this particular Saturday afternoon with only 25 Members present. We ought not to do it on a controverted issue of this character. I am sorry that the chairman of this committee, who represents the administration, has been so persistent in fighting against the results of the points of order made by my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. As fast as one point of order was sustained the ingenuity of the gentleman from Virginia would immediately get around it by offering another amendment that would still bring about the desired result.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SLEMP. Last year this matter came before the House and before our committee, and I opposed it.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not the gentleman oppose it now?

Mr. SLEMP. Just a moment. Let me make my statement. I am in the midst of a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to be courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. SLEMP. It was put in in the Senate——

Mr. BLANTON. And therefore, q. e. d., the House ought to put it back every time.

Mr. SLEMP. I want to finish my statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SLEMP. It was brought back here and agreed to on the floor of the House. I do not know whether the gentleman was here or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I was here fighting it then just like I am fighting it now.

Mr. SLEMP. At any rate it was put in. Now, since that time and under authority granted by Congress, contracts have been entered into by the Postmaster General, and here is an appropriation to carry out that contract.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of this proposition?

Mr. SLEMP. I am in favor of carrying out the contract that Congress authorized the Postmaster General to make, and that he made under authority of Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman is not in favor of this proposition.

Mr. SLEMP. I have stated my position on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 26, noes 10.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. If there were enough men here to order tellers I would ask for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 13593, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, January 3, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

6714. By Mr. LEA of California: Petition of 56 citizens of California, protesting against the passage of the Sunday observance bills; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

6715. By Mr. RADCLIFFE: Petition of sundry citizens of New Jersey, concerning the joint resolution to extend immediate aid to the people of the German and Austrian Republics; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

6716. By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of the National Conference of State Manufacturers' Associations, relative to immigration bill and favoring selective immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

6717. Also, petition of C. H. Dahlstrom et al., Parkers Prairie, Minn., requesting legislation to stabilize the price of farm products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

6718. Also, petition of the Marckel Co., Perham, Minn., to abolish discriminatory tax on small-arms ammunition and firearms; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6719. By Mr. TEMPLE: Petition of American citizens of Ukrainian origin, assembled on December 17 at Carnegie, Pa., relating to conditions in East Galicia; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

6720. Also, petition of Washington Presbytery, Washington, Pa., urging the passage at an early date of Senate bill 4092, for the purpose of giving asylum to Turkish refugees; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

6721. By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Resolution from the General Henry W. Lawton Camp, No. 1, United Spanish War Veterans, Denver, Colo., relative to the unjust attitude of the Bureau of Pensions in construing liberally the provisions of the Sells Act granting pensions to the veterans of the Spanish-American War; to the Committee on Pensions.

6722. By Mr. VARE: Petition of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, indorsing the administration of Attorney General Daugherty; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1923.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we bless Thee this morning that notwithstanding the passage of the years Thou art the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Looking unto Thee as we enter upon the duties of the new year, we ask for wisdom, we ask for strength of purpose, and such conviction of right and of responsibility that the days as they come and go may reveal to us more and more that along the untrodden pathways we are divinely guided and helped. Bless all for whom we shall pray this morning who bear burdens for State and for Nation, and may great grace be our portion. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, December 27, 1922, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is necessarily detained because of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the second annual report of the Federal Power Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, containing information relative to permits and licenses issued under the Federal water power act, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Quartermaster General of the Army, transmitting a list of American soldier dead returned from overseas to be reinterred in the Arlington National Cemetery Thursday, January 4, 1923, at 2.30 p. m., which was ordered to lie on the table for the information of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM CALIFORNIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the credentials of HIRAM W. JOHNSON, chosen a Senator of the United States from the State of California, which were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Executive Department.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye that whereas it appears from the statement of the vote made by the secretary of state, and filed in his office, a copy of which has been transmitted to this office, that at the general election held on Tuesday, the 7th day of November, A. D. 1922, in this State HIRAM W. JOHNSON received the highest number of votes cast for the office of United States Senator.

Now, therefore, I, William D. Stephens, as Governor of the State of California, in the name and by the authority of the people of the State of California, do hereby commission him, the said HIRAM W. JOHNSON, United States Senator from the State of California.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed at the city of Sacramento this the 18th day of December, A. D. 1922.

[SEAL.]

By the governor:

WM. D. STEPHENS, Governor.

FRANK C. JORDAN, Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Oliver C. Fuller, chairman special committee on taxation of the American Bankers' Association, protesting against the passage of the so-called Kellogg bill relative to taxes on national banks by States, and urging that no immediate legislation be adopted placing banking capital in a separate class for unlimited taxation and that whatever legislation may be passed contain no clause ratifying past illegal taxation, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the Rural Letter Carriers' Association, of Cherokee County, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation providing a maintenance allowance of $600 per year for rural carriers, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lawrence and Hartford, in the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of legislation providing an adequate rural-credit system, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dubois and Dunoir, in the State of Wyoming, praying for the passage of legislation placing third-class postmasters under civil-service rules and regulations, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Thermopolis (Wyo.) National Farm Loan Association, favoring the passage of legislation amending certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, especially relative to the present loan limit, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. KENDRICK presented resolutions adopted by the boards of directors of the National Farm Loan Associations of Lost Springs, Cokeville, and Thermopolis, in the State of Wyoming, favoring the passage of legislation amending certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, especially relative to the present loan limit, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of Rev. J. Fontana and 23 other citizens of New Salem, N. Dak., praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Ed Olson and 24 other citizens of Ryder, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation stabilizing the prices of farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG FORK OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 12473) granting the consent of Congress to the Wynco Block Coal Co., a corporation, to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, in Mingo County, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 967) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the Senator a question? The only reason why I ask the question is that the other day we thought we were passing an ordinary bridge bill, but we found later that it was something else. Is this just an ordinary bridge bill?

Mr. CALDER. I can assure the Senator that the four bills which I am authorized to report are ordinary bridge bills.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "Wynco" and insert "Winco," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Winco Block Coal Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a suspension or foot bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near Naugatuck, in the county of Mingo, State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Winco Block Coal Co., a corporation, to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, in Mingo County, W. Va."

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12170) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the commissioners of Lycoming County, Pa., and their successors in office to construct a bridge across the West Branch of the Susquehanna River from the foot of Arch Street, in the city of Williamsport, Lycoming County, Pa., to the borough of Duboistown, Lycoming County, Pa.," approved August 11, 1916, and I submit a report (No. 966) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved August 11, 1916, authorizing the commissioners of Lycoming County, Pa., and their successors in office to construct a bridge across the West Branch of the Susquehanna River from the foot of Arch Street, in the city of Williamsport, Lycoming County, Pa., to the borough of Duboistown, Lycoming County, Pa., be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge hereby authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. FRANCIS RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I also report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 4116) granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Missouri, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Francis River, in the State of Missouri, and I submit a report (No. 965) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "point," to insert the words "suitable to the interests of navigation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State Highway Commission of Missouri and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Francis River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation on the county line between Butler and Dunklin Counties, on the south line of section 3, township 22 north, range 8 east, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906. Such bridge shall be a part of Federal aid project No. 212.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDER. From the same committee I also report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4122) granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Toll Bridge Co. for construction of a bridge across Red River between Montague County, Tex., and Jefferson County, Okla., and I submit a report (No. 964) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Interstate Toll Bridge Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between Montague County, Tex., and Jefferson County, Okla., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

A bill (S. 4267) for the relief of Franklin P. Eastman, owner of the lighter Eastman No. 14; to the Committee on Claims.

AMERICAN REPRESENTATION ON REPARATION COMMISSION.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 4268) authorizing representation of the United States on the Reparation Commission; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I wish to state that it is my intention if the opportunity shall be presented to make a statement in respect to the bill some time to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for surveying oil and oil-shale lands, for surveys and resurveys under the rectangular system provided by law of public lands deemed to be valuable for oil and oil shale, including office work in offices of surveyors general, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13559, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment providing that Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 4th day of March and whose credentials in due form of law shall have been presented to the Senate, or filed with the Secretary thereof, are authorized to appoint the same number of clerical assistants, at the same annual salaries, to which qualified Senators, not chairmen of committees, are entitled whose compensation shall be paid out of the appropriation for clerical assistance to Senators, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13615, the second deficiency appropriation bill, 1923, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SHIPPING BOARD OPERATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 391), as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate in the earliest possible time information showing the different routes, lines, and services in which the Shipping Board ships are now engaged and under what management and direction in each case.

Second, a statement of the profits and losses under each MO–4 contract entered into to date, naming the operators and the number and kind of ships in each service, and at the present time and particularly the operating revenues and expenses under each contract and route for the year 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not I shall have any objection to the resolution, but I should like if the Senator from Florida would permit it to go over for a little while until I have an opportunity to examine it and probably talk it over with him. Then, later in the day, if there shall be no objection to the resolution, the Senator may call it up. The only thing which occurs to me is that if we disclose publicly the business of any one of these routes it may furnish very valuable information to our foreign competitors; and I know the Senator from Florida would not desire to do that any more than would I. That is the only thing I have in mind in reference to the resolution, and I should like to talk to the Senator about the terms of the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I had not thought of that feature of the resolution. Of course, I do not wish to accomplish that. My main purpose, however, is to get the information which we sought to get at the hearings as to each shipping route. I wish to locate, if I can, where the losses are occurring; and I think if we had a report as to the operating expense and the revenue derived from each route, we should be able to ascertain where the loss was taking place and be able to correct it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is probable; but, of course, the resolution, if we agree to it, will make such information public. I should, therefore, like to have the Senator withhold the resolution for a little while in order that I may have an opportunity to talk it over with him.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let the resolution take that course, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

SHIPPING BOARD CONTRACT FOR TANKERS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The resolution (S. Res. 390) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate in the earliest possible time a statement showing the substance of the contract made with the Swift-Shore Co. of New York for tankers, giving the number of tankers and the dead-weight tonnage; whether the Shipping Board built or caused to be built these tankers, and, if so, by whom and on what terms; whether the order was placed with the Northwestern Steel Co. of Portland, Oreg., and the cost per dead-weight ton of the tankers; the number of tankers built and the dead-weight tonnage; and whether added to the cost which will be stated there will be charges for insurance and interest or other charges.

Second. Were these tankers sold, and, if so, at what price; what proportion of the price was paid in cash; what portion was evidenced by note or notes and mortgages; and what were the terms as to interest and maturity?

Third. Whether these securities were sold, and, if so, at what price, when, and to whom?

Fourth. Give the dates when the contracts were made and the ships delivered; state the total cost to the Government and the total amount realized by the Government.

GRADING OF COAST GUARD OFFICERS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, House bill 10531 is what is known as the Coast Guard bill. It proposes to redistribute the personnel of the Coast Guard without increasing its membership so as to take care of a situation that is very deplorable and which if continued will probably result in the disintegration of the Coast Guard, as there will be no hope of promotion therein. The bill is now on the calendar, having passed the other House, and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate have reported it without amendment. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10531) to distribute the commissioned line and engineer officers of the Coast Guard in grades, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of permanent commissioned line officers of the Coast Guard now authorized by law shall be distributed in grades, as follows: One commandant, 7 captains, 12 commanders, 35 lieutenant commanders, 37 lieutenants, and 37 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns; and the number of permanent commissioned engineer officers now authorized by law shall be distributed in grades, as follows: One engineer in chief, 3 captains (engineering), 6 commanders (engineering), 12 lieutenant commanders (engineering), 22 lieutenants (engineering), and 42 lieutenants (junior grade) (engineering) and ensigns (engineering). Promotions to the grades created by this act, namely, captain, captain (engineering), and commander (engineering), shall be made from the next lower grade by seniority: Provided, That lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade), both line and engineering, may be promoted, subject to examination as provided by law, without regard to number or length of service in grade, to such grades in the Coast Guard not above lieutenant commander or lieutenant commander (engineering) as correspond to the permanent ranks and grades that may be attained in accordance with law by line officers of the regular Navy of the same length of total commissioned service, and officers thus promoted shall be extra numbers in their respective grades, which extra numbers shall not at any one time exceed the following, respectively: Twenty lieutenant commanders, 15 lieutenants, 15 lieutenant commanders (engineering), and 8 lieutenants (engineering), but no officer shall be promoted under this proviso who would thereby be advanced in rank ahead of an officer in the same grade and corps whose name stands above his on the official precedence list: Provided further, That captains and captains (engineering) shall have the rank of, and be of corresponding grade to, captains in the Navy, and commanders (engineering) shall have the rank of, and be of corresponding grade to, commanders in the Navy.

SEC. 2. That the title of captain commandant in the Coast Guard is hereby changed to commandant. Hereafter the commandant shall be selected from the active list of line officers not below the grade of commander and shall have, while serving as commandant, the rank, pay, and allowances of a rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy: Provided, That any officer who shall hereafter serve as commandant shall, when retired, be retired with the rank of commandant and with the pay of a rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy on the retired list, and that an officer whose term of service as commandant has expired may be appointed a captain and shall be an additional number in that grade; but if not so appointed, he shall take the place on the lineal list in the grade that he would have attained had he not served as commandant and be an additional number in such grade: Provided further, That the engineer in chief, while so serving, shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain (engineering) in the Coast Guard, and hereafter the engineer in chief shall be selected from the active list of engineer officers not below the grade of lieutenant commander (engineering): And provided further, That an officer who shall hereafter serve as engineer in chief shall, when retired, be retired with the rank of engineer in chief and with the pay of a captain (engineering) on the retired list, and that an officer whose term of service as engineer in chief has expired may be appointed a commander (engineering) and shall be an additional number in that grade; but if not so appointed, he shall take the place on the lineal list in the grade that he would have attained had he not served as engineer in chief and be an additional number in such grade: And provided further, That a constructor, after 10 years' commissioned service in the Revenue Cutter Service and Coast Guard, shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant commander, and after 20 years' commissioned service the rank, pay, and allowances of a commander.

SEC. 3. That hereafter no commissioned officer of the Coast Guard shall be promoted to a higher grade or rank on the active list, except to commandant or to engineer in chief, until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all the duties of such higher grade or rank have been established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers appointed by the President, and until he has been examined by a board of medical officers and pronounced physically qualified to perform all the duties of such higher grade or rank: Provided, That if any commissioned officer shall fail in his physical examination for promotion and be found incapacitated for service by reason of physical disability contracted in the line of duty, he shall be retired with the rank to which his seniority entitled him to be promoted: Provided further, That hereafter when a commissioned officer of the Coast Guard who has had 40 years' service shall retire, he shall be placed on the retired list with the rank and retired pay of one grade above that actually held by him at the time of retirement; and, in the case of a captain, the rank and retired pay of one grade above shall be the rank of commodore and the pay of a commodore in the Navy on the retired list.

SEC. 4. That an ensign, an ensign (engineering), or a district superintendent with the rank of ensign, shall be required to complete three years' service in his grade, after which he shall be eligible for promotion to the next higher grade without regard to the number already in that higher grade.

SEC. 5. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Coast Guard as now provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the table Senate Resolution 385 and that it may be now considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 385) submitted by Mr. JONES of Washington December 22, 1922, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five, to be composed of Senators who will be Members of the Sixty-eighth Congress, to be appointed by the Vice President, no more than three to belong to the same political party, is hereby authorized. Such committee is authorized and directed to study the rules of procedure of the Senate and to report and recommend what changes should be made in order to expedite business and to enable a majority to bring a question to a vote for final action and at the same time afford reasonable protection for the rights of the minority. Such committee shall submit its report and recommendations to the Senate on or before the second Monday after the opening of the first session of the Senate in the Sixty-eighth Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Washington to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, will not the Senator allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Rules, and does he not think it is best that it should go to that committee so that it may consider the question involved?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator thinks that it should go there, I will not object to the resolution being referred to the Rules Committee. Of course, it speaks for itself; it is very plain, and I had hoped that the Senate would pass it and authorize the creation of the special committee, which can do nothing except investigate, study, and report its recommendations to the Senate. If, however, the Senator prefers that the resolution should go to the Rules Committee, of course, one objection will take it there in any event, and I have no serious objection to its being referred to the Committee on Rules, but I hope, of course, that the Rules Committee will consider it.

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped the Senator would suggest that it go to the Rules Committee, because certainly that committee should consider this question. It involves a matter of so much importance that the Rules Committee, it seems to me, would be the proper committee to consider it, rather than a select committee, and if the Senator does not make the request I shall ask that it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well, let the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

COMMEMORATION OF CENTENARY OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a very small bill to which there is no opposition at all, and which has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Banking and Currency, may be considered at this time. I refer to Order of Business No. 924, being Senate bill 4096.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I had hoped we might go on with the calendar this morning until 2 o'clock, and probably the bill referred to by the Senator from California would be reached. I shall, however, offer no objection to the bill being considered now, so far as I am personally concerned.

The VICE PRSEIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4096) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine there shall be coined at the mints of the United States silver 50-cent pieces to the number of not more than 300,000, such 50-cent pieces to be of the standard troy weight, composition, diameter, device, and design as shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value.

SEC. 2. That the coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the Los Angeles Clearing House and upon payment by such clearing house to the United States of the par value of such coins.

SEC. 3. That all laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coin, or for other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we will accomplish much by considering only the unobjected bills. I think we had better take the bills up under the rule as they are reached in order that every Senator may have a chance. As I recall, we have recently cleaned up the calendar of unobjected bills.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well. I withdraw my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order, and the Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill may go over.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator, as I understand, can not have the bill go over unless a motion to that effect is made and agreed to. There was no order made that we should consider only unobjected bills, but the Senate is operating under the rule that the bills on the calendar shall be considered as they are reached. If the Senator from Utah desires to ask unanimous consent that the bill go over, I shall not object.

Mr. McKELLAR. What objection has the Senator from Utah to the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us dispose of the bill. It has been on the calendar for a long time, and has been recommended unanimously by the full Judiciary Committee. As the law now is individuals having claims against the Government can only institute suits in the Federal district court in the States where they live where the claim involved does not exceed $10,000. This bill proposes to extend the amount to $50,000. It is intended to allow a citizen in any district in the United States to bring suit in the Federal court if the amount of the claim does not exceed that sum.

Such cases will be tried on evidence furnished by the plaintiff and by the Government in the respective States, where the Government has its district attorneys to represent it. Instead of requiring the individual who has a claim against the Government to come to Washington and employ a Washington lawyer to bring suit, this bill, by extending the limit from $10,000 to $50,000 will allow the suit to be brought in the United States court in the district where the claimant lives.

I do not think there ought to be any objection to the bill. There was some objection on the part of the Attorney General because it was alleged the Government would be involved in an additional expense, but I think there will be no additional expense imposed on the Government, because the Government enjoys the franking privilege and every document which the Government has in Washington and desires to use in its defense in any claim can be sent down under frank to the court where the proceedings are being had. The Government, I repeat, has able representatives in every district, and the cases can be tried there and the evidence sent down by the Government. Under the existing situation a citizen of the United States who has a claim against the Government has to come here at great expense and employ Washington lawyers to conduct his case. The Judiciary Committee thought this was a proper bill in the interest of those who have claims against the Government not in excess of the amount specified in the bill. All large claims will have to be tried before the Court of Claims, as they are now, but suits involving less than $50,000 may be tried in the district courts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from North Carolina that this bill ought to be disposed of. I think the bills on the calendar that have been reported ought to have a chance for a vote, and I think the Senate ought to vote on this bill, although I do not agree with my friend from North Carolina that it should be passed, and just in a few words I want to say what my objection to it is.

The Court of Claims was organized to allow citizens of the United States to bring suits sounding in contract against the Government of the United States. It is not merely that we have five judges down there to try these cases, but we have an organized bureau of the Government in the Department of Justice to look after the Government's side of the claims. There is no trouble in the world, if the cases are prepared, about having a hearing and a decision in the Court of Claims. Most of the delays in the Court of Claims have come about because the cases were not prepared; but the situation in the Court of Claims to-day is such that if a case gets on the calendar it is disposed of if the contestants desire its consideration within the term, and it is decided within a few weeks after it is argued.

The only ground on which we could say that these cases should be sent to the district courts is the convenience, I will not say of the litigants—because in the Court of Claims the witnesses are not brought here; in this class of cases the testimony is taken by deposition—but the convenience of the lawyers. Many years ago, in small cases, as a matter of convenience, jurisdiction was given to the district courts to try these cases up to $2,000; then the limit was increased to $10,000; and now it is proposed to increase the jurisdiction to $50,000. I think there is a serious objection on the part of the Government, looking at it from a Government standpoint, to that being done. I think that every man who has a legitimate claim against the Government should have an opportunity to be heard and try his case; but the Government has its side of these cases as well. The district attorneys throughout the United States are not trained in presenting the Government's side of these cases. It is a specialty. They have an enormous amount of business of their own to attend to, especially now, when the business on the criminal side of the dockets of the United States courts has largely increased. They have their own business to look after. They are not organized to look after the Government's side of these cases and protect the Treasury against illegitimate claims.

More than that, these claims require the testimony of the Government. A great many of them grow out of war contracts. That testimony is in Washington. It is not in Alabama or Arizona or New Mexico or North Carolina; it is in Washington. If we authorize the trying of these claims in the district courts of the various States we are either going to require these records to be taken out of Washington and carried to North Carolina or Alabama or New Mexico, or we are going to have the Government deprived of its testimony in the case.

These important papers might be carried down to one of the States in defense of a $50,000 suit, but, on the other hand, there might be suits pending here involving $200,000 or $1,000,000, and if the papers were lost the Government might lose its defense. I think the only thing involved here is the convenience of the lawyers, not the litigants, because their testimony is going to be taken by deposition anyhow in this class of cases. More than that, when they are tried here there is more uniformity in the decisions, because there is a direct appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the appeal from the district court goes to the circuit court, and we may have the circuit court deciding a case one way and the Supreme Court deciding it another way.

I am not disposed to say that in the smaller cases, below $10,000, the present jurisdiction should be disturbed; but I do believe it is very unwise, in the interest of the Treasury of the United States and the proper trial of these cases, to increase the jurisdiction of the district courts and turn over the trial of these cases to men who are not informed, who are not familiar with them, when we have an organized bureau in the Department of Justice to handle these cases and try them here; and it must be remembered that in most instances a number of these cases follow along the same line. Occasionally there is a separate case, but in a great number of instances where one case is tried it is a standard case, and the rest stand or fall by that one decision; and there are trained men in the department who know the Government side and can protect the Government's interests.

For that reason I shall not vote for the bill, but I think the Senator is right in saying that the bill is entitled to have a vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this matter was considered by the Judiciary Committee, and was urged by lawyers representing every section of the United States. We can not see why one of our constituents should actually be denied, on account of the immense expense, the right of having his claim heard in the court. A claim is a claim, and a lawyer is a lawyer. The district attorneys are generally good lawyers. They understand how to try cases. A claim is no different from any other case. This does not involve the great war claims, because it is limited to $50,000. A man in Florida or Ohio or Georgia has a claim against the United States. Why should he be put to the tremendous expense of coming here and paying some Washington lawyer, when there are good lawyers at home that he could get for half the price?

This bill is in the interest of the people. It is giving justice to the people. Through the long delay in the Court of Claims the people are absolutely denied justice, on account of the immense number of claims that are brought here from all over the United States, when a claimant could go and try his case in his own district and the Government has a lawyer there to represent it. The claimant can have his own lawyer and the testimony of the Government can be presented. The Government has every right, without any expense, to present its evidence. The expressage is paid for the papers to be sent; the franking privilege is granted to the Government; it has its lawyers; and why not give to a constituent in our own States who has a small claim not exceeding $50,000 the right to have it tried in the Federal court at his own home? It would be much less expensive to the Government, because the Court of Claims, when a case is brought, sends these inspectors or referees, as they are called, down to the States at great expense—$10 a day—to take the testimony down there instead of letting the case be tried in the Federal court at home. Let our people try their cases in their own homes, instead of coming here to try them in the interest of these Washington lawyers. This limitation is in their interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from North Carolina says; but I want to ask him, if he is so anxious to have these cases tried at home, why does he deprive the litigant of the right of trial by jury?

Mr. OVERMAN. This is a question that is tried upon record evidence.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may or may not be.

Mr. OVERMAN. That would make it even more important that a constituent of the Senator from Tennessee should have his case tried in his own balliwick, before his own jury, by his own lawyer.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator; but the Senator provides in this bill and the last sentence of the bill as reported provides as follows:

> All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.

I call the Senator's attention to this fact, which is not only forgotten by the Senator and other Senators on the Judiciary Committee, but it seems to be almost forgotten by all the courts of our country: The Constitution of the United States provides in three separate places that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, and yet the Senator is seeking to take it away from litigants in this class of cases.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that applies only to cases cognizable at the common law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but what the framers of our Constitution meant was to give to the litigants the right of trial by jury. The provision has been construed by the courts not to be as broad as it was intended by the framers of the Constitution that it should be. What I want to know of the Senator is this: If he wants the people back home in his State and in mine and in other States to have the right of a trial in their own local community, why does he not follow the plain direction of the Constitution and provide that we shall have jury trials there just as elsewhere?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am following the statute of the United States. This bill amends the old statute which provides how these cases shall be tried, which has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. These are claims not cognizable at common law, and therefore the Supreme Court has decided that they could be tried without a jury.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but the Supreme Court could not decide that if Congress provided in this bill that they should have the right of trial by jury, it ought to be given; and I want to say to the Senator that while I have no objection in the world to this bill being considered—I see that it was reported away back in May, 1921, and it ought to be heard; the Senate ought to pass on it—I am going to vote against the Senator's bill unless he strikes out the provision about trial by jury, because I am one of those antiquated men who believe in the right of trial by jury.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, Mr. President, the Senator had better move to amend the general statute. This bill only amends the general law which is in force to-day in regard to claims. I hope the Senator will not vote against this bill for that reason. Let him propose an amendment to the general law.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to say so, I should like very much to vote for a general statute on the subject, but I am not going to vote for any statute that deprives citizens of the United States or of any State of the right of trial by jury.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is an amendment to the law that provides for that. The Senate can do as it pleases with it. I have no interest in it, except in the interest of my constituents who may have claims against the Government and who ought to be able to try them at home instead of coming to Washington at great expense and incurring great expense for witnesses and employing lawyers here in Washington. I am going to leave it to the Senate to do as it pleases. I have no interest in the bill. I simply think it is in the interest of justice and economy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the past I have objected to the consideration of this bill. I think it is a very, very unwise measure.

In the first place, as stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—and I agree with every word he says in relation to this measure—the law provided that cases involving claims of $2,000 or less could be tried in the district courts. Then, after that, the limit was increased to $10,000, and now we are asked to increase it to $50,000.

I am not going to repeat here what the Senator from Alabama has so well said in giving his reasons for objecting to and voting against the bill; but I do want to call attention to the fact that in the Court of Claims—a court that has been set up by Congress to hear claims against the United States—when one case is decided all similar cases are decided by that court in the same way.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator know that a man might as well be denied a trial as to have to go to the Court of Claims and be blocked for years?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not know that.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is a fact.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, that statement has been repeatedly made on the floor of the Senate, and without intending to contradict the Senator from Minnesota, who I know thinks it is true, I have been assured that there is no difficulty in the world to-day in getting a trial of any case within one term of the court, and I know that to be so, because I have had cases in the Court of Claims myself, not that I was trying them as a lawyer but I was a litigant. For several years past the Court of Claims has sounded its docket every term, and there has been an opportunity to try every case, if the litigants wanted to try them.

Mr. OVERMAN. The cases do not get on the docket. Sometimes it takes five years to get a case on the docket.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is now speaking about the litigants preparing their cases.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Court of Claims sends its men out to take the testimony, and the testimony is sent in only after great delay. I agree with the Senator that the court tries all the cases on the docket.

Mr. SMOOT. You can not find any complaint against the court if the litigants do not prepare the cases for trial.

Mr. McNARY. I make a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. McNARY. We are proceeding under Rule VIII, and we have already taken 35 minutes on this one item. We have only 2 hours altogether for the consideration of these cases on the calendar. I ask for the enforcement of Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. Under Rule VIII each Senator has 5 minutes.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Utah and the Senator from Alabama have spoken for more than five minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not been on my feet five minutes.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for an observance of the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to have the rule enforced, but I have not been on the floor five minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that no Senator has spoken more than five minutes or more than once.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the rules in force in the Federal courts cases can be expedited, but cases have been tied up here in the Court of Claims for years, when men could not get a hearing.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not the fault of the court.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I have only a moment.

Mr. WATSON. The fault is not with the court; it is with the litigants themselves. I have been assured by two of the judges of the Court of Claims in personal conversation within the last 30 days that a hearing can be had in any case in one term of court if the litigants press their cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that this bill will cover perhaps 90 per cent of the cases which will be brought against the Government of the United States. That means that the records in all those cases now at Washington will have to be sent all over the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where did the Senator get his information that this takes in 90 per cent of the cases? It does not take in 10 per cent of them.

Mr. SMOOT. It will if this limitation of $50,000 is put in.

Mr. OVERMAN. The limitation is $50,000, but the Court of Claims handles cases amounting to $100,000, $200,000, $500,000, and over a million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, there are few claims of more than $50,000. There are some that run as high as a million dollars and others more than a million dollars, but in the great bulk of the cases the amount claimed is less than $50,000, and this would mean taking the business from the Court of Claims in Washington and transferring it to courts all over the United States. Of course, the evidence that is collected by the Government is in the archives of the Government, and it will be sent all over the United States. Those are the facts in the case. If we want to have a condition of that kind, all we will have to do is to vote for this bill, but I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. How far is the Court of Claims behind?

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the docket is concerned—and that is all the court has anything to do with—they are almost up to date. I will say to the Senator that they are as nearly up to date as any court in the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. So far as the docket itself is concerned, they are up to date, but many of the cases do not get on the docket until the men who go down and take the testimony send it here, and they are sometimes five years behind time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would this not be likely to engender a great many suits against the Government all over the country?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so. I do not see why.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean improvident suits. It seems to me that everyone who even thought he might have a claim against the Government would be willing to risk the cost and go into court.

Mr. OVERMAN. If a man thinks he has a case against the Government he ought to have a right to go and try it out, if he is willing to put up the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not think the reason for this legislation rests at all upon the difficulty or delay in securing an adjudication before the Court of Claims. These causes accruing in behalf of citizens of the United States against the Government of the United States accrue all over this great country, in the State of California, in the State of Washington, in the State of Montana, in the State of Maine. It is a mistake to assume that all the records repose in the archives here in the city of Washington. I recall prosecuting at one time a case of this character arising out of a building contract, the construction of Fort Yellowstone, in the Yellowstone National Park. My client had an opportunity to bring his witnesses here to the city of Washington or to try the case purely upon deposition, if he had a desire to do so. He preferred to abate a very considerable amount of his claim and bring it in the district court of Montana, rather than undergo the expense and inconvenience of coming here to the city of Washington to try a lawsuit. The Government was put to no inconvenience about the matter at all. The evidence was all in the hands of the division office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

So a controversy might easily arise concerning the construction of some public improvement in the city of San Francisco involving an amount somewhere between $10,000 and $50,000. Why should the parties to that transaction with the Government of the United States be compelled to come to the city of Washington to try a lawsuit involving that matter? Of course, there are many of these cases which will be tried before the Court of Claims, all claims involving an amount above $50,000, but in many of the cases, if the claim is less than $50,000, the man will surrender his right rather than come here to the city of Washington and employ lawyers in this city for the purpose of prosecuting.

It is a mere question of justice to the people who have claims against the Government of the United States arising out of contracts, whether they shall be compelled to travel 3,000 miles before they can get a court to try their claims or whether they shall have a court in the immediate vicinity, where the cases can be tried in an inexpensive way. I can see no reason at all why this legislation should not be enacted. It seems to me it is founded in the elemental principles of justice, namely, that a man is entitled to have a court before which his cause can be tried, and have that court somewhere in the immediate vicinity where the transaction took place.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, for information I would like to inquire of the Senator what reason prompted Congress in the beginning to place limitations around the jurisdiction of the courts in the various districts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad the Senator asked that question. We started out upon the principle that the Government was not open to suit at all. If anyone had a claim against the Government he was to come before Congress, no matter how trifling it might be in amount or in the principle involved, and Congress would make an appropriation. But in the course of time it was recognized that justice could not be administered in that way, and we created a Court of Claims, and then anyone who had a case against the Government would come before that court and file his claim. It was then recognized that that amounted to practically a denial of justice as to all claims of limited amount arising in remote sections of the country, and Congress authorized suit to be brought against the Government of the United States in the district courts of the various districts where the amount involved did not exceed $10,000.

I defy anyone to demonstrate that the Government of the United States has suffered to any extent whatever by reason of that legislation. I deny that anyone can demonstrate that any unjust claim against the Government was allowed through the process of the Federal courts. The statute carefully guards it. There is no right to trial by jury. The cause is heard before the district judge, no trial by jury being given at all, so that the prejudice which is supposed to exist against the Government in the prosecution of claims of this character can not possibly obtain.

No harm has come, no injury of any character has resulted, to the Government on account of the right extended to citizens to prosecute their cases in the various courts of the country where the amount involved does not exceed $10,000, and I can not conceive how any injury can come to the Government from giving to these courts the right to try these cases against the Government where the amount involved does not exceed $50,000. I hope the legislation will be enacted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not certain whether objection to the present consideration of the bill was raised.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On May 16, 1921, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, amended the bill by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understand that during my absence some question was raised as to the provision of the bill providing that the trial of these cases should be without a jury. I want to state that in that respect no change is made in the law. The only change made is an increase of the limit from $10,000 to $50,000. The law now provides that these cases shall be tried without juries. We are instituting no innovation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that entirely, and that is exactly what I am opposed to. I think the original law ought to have provided that they should be tried by jury. I do not think the right of trial by jury should be denied American citizens, and for that reason I am going to vote against the bill, and I am going to ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator will not vote against the bill upon that ground, because that introduces an exceedingly debatable question, which we endeavored to avoid in the preparation of this legislation. I think the Senator might very well defer his views upon that matter until some time when the question can be presented for consideration. It was not under consideration by the Judiciary Committee. We did not canvass that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand what the Senator says, but I want to say in reply that I believe in the spirit of the Constitution in reference to jury trials. There are three specific provisions therefor in the Constitution and amendments, and believing honestly and thoroughly in jury trials, and believing that the Federal courts have from time to time construed the Constitution improperly in depriving citizens of jury trials, I have made up my mind to vote against any bill that deprives an American citizen of a jury trial, and as this bill does deprive an American citizen of the jury trial, I am going to vote against this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. During his absence I promised to take care of him with a pair on all matters aside from matters relating to the shipping bill. Not knowing how he would vote on the pending proposition, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). I have temporarily a general pair with my colleague [Mr. WILLIS], who is detained because of serious illness in his family. I do not know how he would vote if present. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. WILLIS's name was called). As previously announced, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is necessarily detained on account of serious illness in his family.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire whether the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. May I inquire if the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I am not at liberty to vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CARAWAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BAYARD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. In his absence, being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Borah	Ernst	New	Stanley

So the bill was passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 20 of section 24 of "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be amended to read as follows:

"20. Concurrent with the Court of Claims of all claims not exceeding $50,000 founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect to which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable, and of all set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the Government of the United States against any claimant against the Government in said court: Provided, however, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as giving to either the district courts or the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the late Civil War and commonly known as 'war claims,' or to hear and determine other claims which had been rejected or reported on adversely prior to the 3d day of March, 1887, by any court, department, or commission authorized to hear and determine the same, or to hear and determine claims for pensions; or as giving to the district courts jurisdiction of cases brought to recover fees, salary, or compensation for official services of officers of the United States or brought for such purpose by persons claiming as such officers or as assignees or legal representatives thereof; but no suit pending on the 27th day of June, 1898, shall abate or be affected by this provision: And provided further, That no suit against the Government of the United States shall be allowed under this paragraph unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made: Provided, That the claims of married women, first accrued during marriage, of persons under the age of 21 years, first accrued during minority, and of idiots, lunatics, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas at the time the claim accrued, entitled to the claim shall not be barred if the suit be brought within three years after the disability has ceased; but no other disability than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury."

ARMAMENT CONFERENCE TREATIES (S. DOC. NO. 282).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, on motion of Mr. LODGE, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State in response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on December 11, 1922, requesting him to furnish to the Senate "information showing to what extent and by what nations the six treaties known as the armament conference treaties, described in Senate Document 124, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, have been ratified, and to give the date of ratification in each case by each country."

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 3, 1923.

CIVIL WAR PENSIONS—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 281).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I am returning herewith Senate bill 3275, "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, etc.," without my approval.

If the act were limited to its provisions in behalf of the surviving participants in the Mexican and Civil Wars and widows of the War of 1812, it would still be without ample justification. The Commissioner of Pensions estimates its additional cost to the Treasury to be about $108,000,000 annually, and I venture the prediction that with such a precedent established the ultimate pension outlay in the half century before us will exceed $50,000,000,000. The act makes no pretense of new consideration for the needy or dependent, no new generosity for the veteran wards of the Nation; it is an outright bestowal upon the Government's pension roll, with a heedlessness for the Government's financial problems which is a discouragement to every effort to reduce expenditure and thereby relieve the Federal burdens of taxation.

The more particular objection to this act, however, lies in its loose provision for pensioning widows. The existing law makes the widow of a Civil War veteran eligible to a pension if she married him prior to June 27, 1905. In other words, marriage within 40 years of the end of the Civil War gives a veteran's widow a good title to a pension. The act returned herewith extends the marriage period specifically to June 27, 1915, and provides that after that date any marriage or cohabitation for two years prior to a veteran's death shall make the widow the beneficiary of a pension at $50 per month for the remainder of her life. In view of the fact that this same bill makes provision for pensions for widows of the veterans of the War of 1812, the possible burden of this sweeping provision seems worthy of serious consideration. Frankly, I do not recognize any public obligation to pension women who now, nearly 60 years after the Civil War, became the wives of veterans of that war.

The Government has so many defenders to whom generous treatment is due that Congress will find it necessary to consider all phases of our obligations when making provision for any one group.

The compensation paid to the widows of World War veterans, those who shared the shock and sorrows of the conflict, amounts to $24 per month. It would be indefensible to insist on that limitation upon actual war widows if we are to pay $600 per year to widows who marry veterans 60 years after the Civil War.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 3, 1923.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I feel that all Senators ought to have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the contents of the message which has just been read from the President. I therefore move that the message be printed and that in the meantime it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH WHITE.

The bill (S. 1467) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Elizabeth White, administratrix of the estate of Samuel N. White, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Elizabeth White, administratrix of the estate of Samuel N. White, deceased, late of West Feliciana Parish, La., $27,800, in full satisfaction of her claim as reported by the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1887, and embraced in House Report No. 97, Sixty third Congress, second session, at page 100, and by clerical error omitted from an appropriation act for its payment after favorable action thereon by both Houses of Congress, and said sum is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this bill has passed the Senate three times and has twice passed the other House. It finally came from the House to the Senate in and as a part of an omnibus claims bill which was referred to the Senate Committee on Claims. That committee struck out of the omnibus claims bill this particular claim, but when the bill came into the Senate, on the 3d day of March, and was taken up for passage, I asked the Senate to reject the amendment proposing to strike out that claim, so that it would remain in the bill as it came from the House. So the Senate rejected the committee amendment and thus the claim became a part of the omnibus claims bill. By an error of enrollment, however, the item was omitted. In the hurry incident to the last hours of the session not only was that claim omitted but there was included another claim that had not been passed upon favorably. Of course, both claims were barred from payment.

The pending bill involves an old controversy. The matter was considered many years ago when I was chairman of the Committee on Claims. Furthermore the cause of the claim arose in a section of country with which I was familiar during the Civil War, as I performed duty there. It involves a case where the Confederate forces took Mr. White's boat and its cargo and forced him to stay with the boat and help to operate it. The boat was afterwards taken from the Confederates by the United States troops. After the war Mr. White took the matter up in court and the court found in his favor. The United States Government appealed, but never prosecuted the appeal. The claim went before the Southern Claims Commission, and they rejected it. Later on, some years afterwards, the boat having in the meantime been used by the United States Government for nearly 900 days continuously without repair or any pay to the owner, was sold for $7,000.

As to the claims for sugar and molasses which were taken with the boat, these articles, I assume, were consumed by the Confederate forces, as we have no record of them. As to the boat itself, years afterwards, when this man was in want, the Government settled with him for the value of the boat alone, and he signed a receipt for that only. The receipt, however, was by an additional certificate worded in a manner which it is now contended establishes the fact that it was in full for the amount due him. Under any circumstances it was a good claim and should have been paid.

Furthermore, the United States is obligated in equity to pay it, because it has been passed upon many times, as I have said, by both Houses separately, and once by the two Houses. I hope that the bill may be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have objected to the consideration of this bill on many occasions. I think the bill is unjust. I do not believe that the Government ought to be called upon to pay the $27,800 which is authorized to be paid by the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I have but five minutes, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana. Let me continue, and after I shall have concluded the Senator from Louisiana may say what he wishes.

Mr. President, this claim was considered under the Tucker Act, and it was decided against the claimant. It was then considered under the Bowman Act, and there was another decision rendered which was adverse to the claimant. The report states that the claimant received payment in full for his claim against the United States. The receipt which he signed is as follows:

Received at Washington, D. C., the 16th of March, 1866, of Bvt. Col. J. C. M. Ferran, quartermaster, United States Army, the sum of $7,000 and — cents, in full of the above account, in check No. 26, on the First National Bank of Washington, D. C., payable to S. N. White or bearer for $7,000.

S. N. WHITE.

Witnesses:
W. M. MACRAE.
C. A. THORNE.

While it is claimed that that payment was made merely for the boat, the receipt specifically states that the payment was in full satisfaction of all claims against the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to say that the receipt which precedes the one which he has read recites the matter differently?

Mr. SMOOT. The certificate as signed by J. C. M. Ferran, major, quartermaster, brevet colonel, United States Army, states:

I certify that the above account is correct, and that it has been made in triplicate and read over carefully to the claimant, Samuel N. White, in the presence of the attesting witnesses, and that he in their presence accepted the sum of $7,000 in full of all claims by him against the United States or its officers on account of the steamer Red Chief No. 1.

J. C. M. FERRAN,
Major, Quartermaster, Brevet Colonel, United States Army.

Think of it, Mr. President! The claimant makes a settlement with the Government for $7,000, and yet those who are in favor of the passage of the pending bill take the position that the receipt was given for the boat only when the claimant signed a receipt for $7,000 in full payment.

The Government of the United States used the boat but 825 days. For the use of the boat for that number of days a claim is made of $27,800, although the boat itself at the conclusion of its use by the Government was sold for $7,000. I can not believe that any such claim as that against the Government ought to be paid.

I know that many times claims bills pass through the Senate when no one is paying any attention to them; I know that claims bills have passed through the Senate half a dozen times without ever being finally enacted into law; but I do not believe that the Government of the United States ought to be called upon to pay this bill of $27,800.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, does the Senator deny that the claim was passed as an amendment to an omnibus claims bill and that it was left out of the enrolled bill by error?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not deny that. It did pass on an omnibus bill; I am quite aware of that.

Mr. WARREN. And when the omnibus claims bill was considered there was a full attendance, of course, in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not always a full attendance on such occasions, I will say to the Senator; and I think this claim was put upon the omnibus bill in the Senate, perhaps, when nobody knew anything about what it was and when Senators did not have the report before them to ascertain really whether the Government of the United States was obligated to the claimant.

Many old claims of this nature have piled up against the Government of the United States. I am perfectly willing to pay such claims wherever there is produced a shadow of justification for them, but there is no justification for paying this claim of $27,800.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator nor do the committees which have investigated this claim agree with him. The Senator reads a receipt signed by Mr. White showing that he, the husband of the old lady, a widow, who is now the claimant under this bill, received $7,000. Mr. President and Senators, that $7,000 was paid for the price of the boat. The boat was sold—and the sale was a mistake, as the War Department admits—and that amount was paid for the boat. As the report of the committee shows, and as the court found, the boat was used for 825 days, I believe.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. RANSDELL. The court found that the claimant was entitled to be paid for the use of the boat, and that is what the committee found.

I wish to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Utah that, in my judgment, this is as just a claim as Congress ever paid. The Senator from Utah says there is not a shadow of evidence back of it. I say that, in my judgment—and I do not often rise upon the floor of the Senate to make any claim for my constituents—I do not know a better claim than this, and I do not know one where a poor old widow has been kept out of her rights for so many years as has the old lady in this case, largely by objections such as the Senator from Utah is now making. I think it is a piece of absolute injustice longer to defer the payment of this claim. Bills providing for its payment have passed the House and the Senate a number of times, and on one occasion a bill embodying the claim passed both Houses of Congress, but, owing to a mistake of the clerk, the item was not put in the enrolled copy of the bill and did not receive, therefore, the signature of the President. The claim has been here time and time again; it is no new claim; it has been before us repeatedly. It would be an outrage on justice, sir, not to act favorably upon it, and I sincerely hope that the Senate will now perform this long-deferred act of simple justice and pass the bill. I wish to thank the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] for trying to secure proper consideration of the case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want again to call the Senate's attention to this receipt. The receipt is what Mr. White signed. He was a man of intelligence, and he could read language; and when the settlement was made between him and an officer of the Government of the United States, he signed this receipt, accepting "the sum of $7,000 in full of all claims by him against the United States or its officers on account of the steamer Red Chief No. 1."

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I again ask for the enforcement of the rule. We are not getting anywhere with the calendar when we take 15 minutes to speak.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not yielded. I did not hear the question of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MCNARY. I asked the Chair for the enforcement of the rule, which is that no Senator can speak for more than five minutes on a given number on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The Chair will state that this bill is under consideration upon motion, and, consequently, the rule to which the Senator from Oregon refers does not apply.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President and Senators, in regard to the last remark of the Senator from Utah, I wish to say that the receipt to which he refers does not say "in full settlement of all claims." Here is the way it reads:

That he, in their presence—

That is, in the presence of witnesses—

accepted the sum of $7,000 in full of all claims by him against the United States or its officers on account of the steamer Red Chief No. 1—

Growing out of the claim which he had made in triplicate, as per some voucher.

The actual facts in connection with that, as I gathered them, were that this old man had had his property taken from him. The Government had used that property. The Government then had sold that property at public sale, and that was all that was offered to him. He would have been very different from most men if he had not signed practically any receipt offered to him. The $7,000 was what the vessel brought at public sale. The Government did not own that vessel. It was Captain White's vessel. The Government had seized it and deprived him of a chance to use it. The Government had actually used it for 825 days, had undoubtedly received great benefit from its use, and then, after using it and probably nearly wearing it out, the Government sold it for $7,000; and Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, said, "We will pay him the $7,000 which his property brought." That was not the Government giving him anything, Mr. President and Senators. That was simply returning to this old man the $7,000 which his property brought at public sale.

The Senator from Utah tries to make it appear that that $7,000 was a donation from the Government. That is the inference from his remarks. The Government did not give this man a cent. It took his property from him, sold it, and then turned over to him the proceeds of that sale. The court found that the Government had used that property for 825 days and that a fair rental value for the use of the property—not for the title to the property, but for the use of it—was the sum fixed in this bill.

I think it is most unjust, Mr. President and Senators, for the Senator from Utah to say that merely turning over to that old man the $7,000 received from the sale of his property compensates him for all his claims. Are you not going to pay him one cent for the 825 days that it was used—not a nickel for all of that? I can not conceive such injustice as that, Mr. President. I know it is a long time since the war; but this claim, to my certain knowledge, has been up here for years and years and years, and it ought to be settled now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are two reasons, as I view this case, why this bill ought not to pass.

The first reason exists because of prior action taken by a commission appointed by the Congress; and that commission, upon full investigation, decided on the merits of the case adversely to the claimant. Let me read from page 2 of the report accompanying the bill:

Samuel N. White (Elizabeth White, administratrix). (S. D. 258–55–2.) Tucker Act. This claim originally presented to Southern Claims Commission; referred to court first February 12, 1887, under Bowman Act; decedent found loyal in 1892, under that reference, but court in 1893 found adversely to claimant on merits.

If there is anything in the world that can be res adjudicata, it would seem to be the case at bar. Here was a case where a claim lingered along for many years, and in 1893 it was referred to the court and tried by the court on its merits. It was not a technical disposition of the case. There was nothing arbitrary. It did not go off on some fine point of law, but there was a decision upon the merits. That means upon the facts—not the legal questions involved, but the merits of the case itself. If we are to revive cases after machinery has been provided, and they have been tried on the merits and no appeal taken, then there is no end to claims that may be presented against the Government. When machinery has been set up by the Government to pass upon claims, and that machinery acts pursuant to law, passes upon the merits, and decides adversely, that ought to end the matter. If the claimants may come again and again and again, ignoring the findings made and trial had and decision rendered, then those things are purely abortive, and we might just as well say that, no matter how many adjudications may be had against an individual, he and his heirs for hundreds of years may revive the claims and present them.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President; the case goes back of that. This case was tried in the court and decided in favor of this litigant, and the United States took an appeal and never followed up that appeal. This man was waiting for a settlement. Finally the claim appeared before the Southern Claims Commission, just as many others did. We have paid I would not undertake to say how much, but to my knowledge more than $40,000,000 of cases which that commission decided on the prima facie facts as they appeared. They had thousands of them—yes, tens of thousands—passing on them very hurriedly, and they have come up and been settled since.

There is another feature of this matter: These claims have all been tried out in the committees. They have all been looked over. They have been presented here in reports. They have passed the House and Senate separately several times. Then they passed here in a composite bill, as we formed the line of action at one time of putting all such matters in omnibus bills, matters which had passed both Houses before but failed to pass both Houses in season to reach the President before adjournment. This bill had really once become a law, so far as that is concerned, except for a mistake of the enrolling clerk, who left it out. As I said before, the same bill or act contained another claim that did not belong there at all. I allude to it simply to show the confusion that happened in the closing days of the Congress, the 3d or 4th of March.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, knowing the fallibility of Congress, the fact that it had passed a bill one time or many times would not influence me in the slightest degree in favor of the bill. In fact, I am rather inclined to think that I might be prejudiced against it; and when the Senator says that it was a part of an omnibus bill, that in and of itself stamps it with some little uncertainty as to its merits. Omnibus bills usually gather in good, bad, and indifferent claims, objects, and subjects. When we have an omnibus bill—take the omnibus pork-barrel public buildings bill—usually, as we know, measures are there found that are unjust, and post offices and public buildings are provided for in little towns and villages and hamlets where, in justice to the Government, none should be provided. So when the Senator pleads that we ought to pass this bill because it has been included in some omnibus bill heretofore, it does not appeal to me at all.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senator makes another mistake. It was put in on this floor, by the vote of the Senate, on a bill of that kind, and, of course, that vote came upon its merits.

Mr. KING. Whether it was upon the omnibus bill originally, or as a sort of a tentacle or an appendix to it, makes no difference; it was an omnibus bill if it passed.

But, Mr. President, I call attention again to this statement:

Court in 1893 found adversely to claimant on merits.

There is no evidence that there was any appeal from that finding on the merits. The Senator from Wyoming indicates that there was some other trial upon some other action or in some other court where the findings were in favor of the plaintiff and against the Government, but the Government appealed. No disposition has been made yet of that appeal, apparently. The appeal is still pending. If the plaintiff had any confidence in her bill, why has she not prosecuted the case which was appealed? Why did she not go to the appellate court and ask, if the Government, which was the appellant, failed to prosecute the appeal, that it be dismissed and remitted to the lower court, and then take such steps to enforce the judgment of the lower court as the case called for?

Mr. President, this statement that the case was tried on the merits by a court and the plaintiff was found against stands uncontradicted. That ought to decide the case; but, aside from that—and I ask the Senate's pardon for referring to a matter that my colleague has so fully covered—I want to call attention again to this release. The able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] attempted rather to explain away the effect, and, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, the damning effect, of the release. Let us read what the release says:

Said voucher, signed by White—

The owner of the boat—reads as follows:

"The United States to S. N. White, Dr., March 16, 1866: The reimbursement of the proceeds of the sale of the steamer Red Chief No. 1, by the United States Quartermaster Department, at Mobile, Ala., on the 12th of October, 1865, it being at the time the property of this said Samuel N. White, which reimbursement is in lieu of the boat and in full payment and release for all claims by said Samuel N. White on the United States Government or its officers on account of said boat, and this said reimbursement 'being in full accord and satisfaction for all claims against the United States and its officers for said boat'"—

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator should add "or its value, $7,000."

Mr. KING. Wait a minute—

for all claims against the United States and its officers for said boat or its value, $7,000.

That language admits of but one construction. There had been a controversy, and the controversy ended in a complete accord and satisfaction, in a complete adjustment of the controversy, the payment of $7,000, and a release of any further claim against the Government.

Mr. President, if men may sign releases in full of all claims, and then 50 years afterwards come before Congress and present claims when perhaps the facts of which the Government might avail itself at the time the release was signed, in order to controvert the claim, may not be provided, the Government will always be at the mercy of individuals and we may revive claims which were settled 50 or 100 years ago and vouchers given, upon some pretext of generosity or averment that some coercive measures were adopted by the Government, to get through large appropriations to pay claims settled many years before. It is a dangerous thing. The Government ought to be protected. There ought to be some period beyond which claimants may not assert their claims, particularly where they have signed releases in full. I regard this as a very dangerous precedent. If the Government may not rely upon acquittances and discharges, then there is no use of the Government settling any claims. It seems to me this would be very unfair; first, because there was a finding on the merits against the claim, and, secondly, because the claimant signed a release of the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as upon the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who is absent. I accordingly withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. POMERENE. Again announcing my pair with my colleague [Mr. WILLIS], who is detained because of illness in his family, not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I understand that my pair, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent, would vote on this question, if present, as I have voted. I therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Brookhart	Glass	Nicholson	Stanley
Broussard	Harris	Norbeck	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Sutherland
Colt	Heflin	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Kendrick	Pepper	Trammell

Edge	Lenroot	Robinson

So the bill was passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1016) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see in the Chamber the Senator who reported the bill or the Senator who introduced the bill, and I want some explanation of the bill or shall have to object to its passage. I therefore ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 491) to provide, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the shipping bill is to be taken up at 2 o'clock, and I shall not ask to have this bill taken up at this time, because it would be impossible to pass it between now and 2 o'clock. Therefore I ask that it may go over to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 7) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2228) to amend certain sections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee desires to be heard upon the bill, as he has an amendment to offer to it, and therefore I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing transportation for dependents of Army field clerks and field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2718) to provide for leasing of the floating dry dock at the naval station, New Orleans, La., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2589) to amend section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia," approved January 15, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 67) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1539) for the relief of Watson B. Dickerman, administrator of the estate of Charles Backman, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1861) authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claim of Capt. David McD. Shearer for compensation for the adoption and use and acquisition by the United States Government of his patented inventions was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 133) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 14) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 12817.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"A reduction of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties specified and imposed by the tariff act of 1922 in respect of all goods, wares, and merchandise which after the passage of this act shall be imported in ships or vessels of the United States.

"All treaties and conventions in conflict herewith shall be denounced and terminated in accordance with their terms and new treaties and conventions shall be entered into conforming herewith in their places."

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator from Texas be good enough to yield that I may ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield for that purpose.

PAYMENT OF CHARGES ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4187) to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to ask the Senator if the consideration of the bill will take any time?

Mr. McNARY. I would not make the request if I thought so. If it leads to debate, I shall, of course, not press it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. With that understanding, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1922, is amended by striking out the words "one year" where they appear in such section and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two years."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in the manner and subject to the conditions imposed by such act of March 31, 1922, to extend for a period not exceeding two years from December 31, 1922, the date of any payment of any charge the date of payment of which has been extended under the provisions of section 1 of such act.

SEC. 3. (a) That every charge the date of payment of which has been extended under section 1 of such act of March 31, 1922, shall in lieu of the rate of interest provided in such act draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date of the passage of this act.

(b) That every charge the date of payment of which is extended under the provisions of section 2 of this act shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date from which it was so extended in lieu of any penalty that may now be provided by law, but in case such charge is not paid at the end of the period for which it is so extended any such penalty shall attach from the date the charge was originally due, as if no extension had been granted.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Add a new section, as follows :

SEC. 4. That section 2 of such act of March 31, 1922, is amended by striking out the words "season of 1922," where they appear in such section, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "seasons of 1922, 1923, and 1924."

Mr. McNARY. I understand the amendment only makes an extension of the provision of the present bill, making it cover two years.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the act approved March 31, 1922, granting relief to settlers on reclamation projects, authorized the extension of the time in which annual construction charges might be paid by settlers until December 31, 1923. Section 2 of that act also provided:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, after due investigation, to furnish irrigation water on Federal irrigation projects during the irrigation season of 1922 to landowners or entrymen who are in arrears for more than one calendar year in the payment of any operation and maintenance or construction charges, notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of the act of August 13, 1914.

And further provided:

That nothing in this section shall be construed to relieve any beneficiary hereunder from payments due or penalties thereon required by said act: Provided further, That the relief provided by this section shall be extended only to a landowner or entryman whose land against which the charges have accrued is actually being cultivated.

The bill now under consideration and approved by our Committee on Reclamation, reported by our chairman, Mr. McNARY, authorizes the extension of time from December 31, 1923, to December 31, 1925, which will no doubt prove very helpful to settlers who, because of crop failures and other disasters, are unable to meet the construction charges. But in many instances, particularly where settlers have been unable to receive anything like fair compensation for their crops, it will be found impossible for them to meet even the maintenance charges.

My amendment simply extends for a corresponding period of time the relief provision in reference to the maintenance charges under which the Secretary is authorized to furnish water to settlers when, on investigation, it is proved they are unable to meet such charges. It is in no sense a repudiation of an obligation; it merely extends the time of payment.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether the terms of the bill extend all payments for a period of two years?

Mr. McNARY. It is only in a few distinct cases, and in those cases the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, where a proper showing is made, extend payment of the construction charges for a period not to exceed two years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Two years from what date?

Mr. McNARY. Two years from 1922, which means the years 1923 and 1924. There are only a very few cases which have been found to date where such action will be necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the title of the act under debate, an act popularly known as the merchant marine act of 1922, or the ship subsidy bill, is "An act to amend and supplement the merchant marine act of 1920, and for other purposes." The act of 1920, although it did not refer to the shipping act of 1916 in its title, might well have been called an act to amend and supplement the last-named measure and measures amendatory thereof. The act of 1920 amended the act of 1916 in important respects, left much of it in force, and contained a number of new provisions. The act of 1916 had been amended in the meantime mainly by the shipping act of 1918, which had reference to war conditions. These acts represent the first efforts of this country on so gigantic a scale to aid in the development of an American merchant marine. It is essential to a proper grasp of the subject before us that we review these acts, understand to what extent they remain in force, and examine the operations of the Shipping Board from its beginning. The shipping act of 1916 was entitled:

An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes."

The first section of that act provides that the term "common carrier by water in foreign commerce"— means a common carrier, except ferryboats running on regular routes, engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property between the United States or any of its Districts, Territories, or possessions and a foreign country, whether in the import or export trade: Provided, That a cargo boat, commonly called "an ocean tramp," shall not be deemed such "common carrier by water" in foreign commerce.

The first section further provides that the term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property on the high seas or the Great Lakes on regular routes from port to port between one State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession.

The first section then provides that the term "common carrier by water" means a common carrier by water in foreign commerce or a common carrier by water in interstate commerce, on the high seas or the Great Lakes, on regular routes, from port to port.

It is further provided by the first section that the term "other person subject to this act" means any person not included in the term "common carrier by water," carrying on the business of forwarding or furnishing wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water; that the term "person" includes corporations, partnerships, and associations, existing under or authorized by the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, or of any foreign country.

Such were the original provisions of section 1 of the shipping act of 1916. This section was amended by the shipping act of July, 1918, to provide further that the term "vessel" included all water craft and other artificial contrivances of whatever description and at whatever stage of construction, whether on the stocks or launched, which are used or are capable of being or are intended to be used as a means of transportation on water, and that the term "documented under the laws of the United States" meant registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States.

As amended prior to the act of 1920 section 2 of the shipping act of 1916 provided:

That within the meaning of that act no corporation, partnership, or association should be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein should be owned by citizens of the United States, and in case of a corporation, unless its president and managing directors should be citizens of the United States and the corporation itself organized under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

That the controlling interest in a corporation should not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States (1) if the title to a majority of the stock should not be vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States, or (2) if the majority of the voting power in such corporation should not be vested in citizens of the United States, or (3) if through any contract or understanding it should be so arranged that the majority of the voting power might be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person not a citizen of the United States, or (4) if by any other means whatsoever control of the corporation should be conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person not a citizen of the United States.

That the provisions of this act should apply to receivers and trustees of all persons to whom the act applied and to the successors or assignees of such persons.

Section 3 of the shipping act of 1916 provided that a board was thereby created, to be known as the United States Shipping Board, and thereinafter referred to as the board; that the board should be composed of five commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, said board to annually elect one of its members as chairman and one as vice chairman; that the first commissioners appointed should continue in office for terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from the date of their appointment, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors to be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy was to be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeded; that the commissioners should be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed upon them by this act and to a fair representation of the geographical divisions of the country; that not more than three of the commissioners should be appointed from the same political party; that no commissioner should be in the employ of or hold any official relation to any common carrier by water or other person subject to this act, or own any stocks or bonds thereof, or be pecuniarily interested therein; that no commissioner should actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment; that any commissioner might be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office; that a vacancy on the board would not impair the right of the remaining members of the board to exercise all its powers; that the board should have an official seal which should be judicially noticed; that the board might adopt rules and regulations in regard to its procedure and the conduct of its business.

Section 4 provided that each member of the board should receive a salary of $7,500 per annum; that the board should appoint a secretary at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, officers, naval architects, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it might find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as might be appropriated for by Congress; that the President, on request of the board, might authorize the detail of officers of the military, naval, or other services of the United States for such duties as the board might deem necessary in connection with its business; that with the exception of the secretary, a clerk to each commissioner, the attorneys, naval architects, and such special experts and examiners as the board might from time to time find necessary for the conduct of its work, all employees of the board should be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil service laws; that the expenses of the board, including necessary expenses for transportation, incurred by the members of the board or by its employees under its order in making any investigation or upon official business in any other place than in the city of Washington, should be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board; that until otherwise provided by law the board might rent suitable offices for its use; that the Auditor for the State and Other Departments should receive and examine all accounts of expenditures of the board.

Section 5, which was repealed by the merchant marine act of 1920, provided that the board, with the approval of the President, was authorized to have constructed and equipped in American shipyards and navy yards or elsewhere, giving preference, other things considered, to domestic yards, or to purchase, lease, or charter vessels suitable, as far as the commercial requirements of the marine trade of the United States might permit, for use as naval auxiliaries or military purposes, and to make necessary repairs and alterations of such vessels, provided that neither the board nor any corporation formed under section 11, in which the United States should be a stockholder, should purchase, lease, or charter any vessel—

(a) Which was then engaged in the foreign or domestic commerce of the United States, unless about to be withdrawn from such commerce without any intention on the part of the owner to return it thereto within a reasonable time.

(b) Which was under the registry or flag of a foreign country then engaged in war.

(c) Which was not adapted or could not by reasonable alterations and repairs be adapted to the purposes of this section.

(d) Which upon expert examination made under the direction of the board, a written report of such examination being filed as a public record, was not without alteration or repair found to be at least 75 per cent as efficient as at the time it was originally put in commission as a seaworthy vessel.

Section 6 provided that the President might transfer, either permanently or for limited periods, to the board such vessels belonging to the War or Navy Department as were suitable for commercial uses and not required for military or naval use in time of peace and cause to be transferred to the board vessels owned by the Panama Railroad Co. and not required in its business.

Section 7, which was repealed by the act of 1920, provided that the board, upon terms and conditions prescribed by it and approved by the President, might charter, lease, or sell to any person, a citizen of the United States, any vessels so purchased, constructed, or transferred.

Section 8, which was repealed by the act of 1920, provided that when any vessel purchased or constructed by or transferred to the board and owned by the United States became in the opinion of the board unfit for the purposes of this act it should be appraised and sold at public or private competitive sale, after due advertisement, free from the conditions and restrictions of this act.

Section 9 provided that any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board by persons who were citizens of the United States might be registered or enrolled and licensed, or both registered and enrolled and licensed, as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto: Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry or enrollment and license under this act and vessels owned by any corporation in which the United States was a stockholder and vessels sold, leased, or chartered by the board to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act, might engage in the coastwise trade of the United States; that each vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board should, unless otherwise authorized by the board, be operated only under such registry, enrollment, and license; that such vessels while employed solely as merchant vessels should be subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States should be interested as owner, in whole or in part, or hold any mortgage, lien, or other interest therein; that no such vessel, without the approval of the board, should be transferred to a foreign registry or flag; nor, except under regulations prescribed by the board, be chartered or leased; that when the United States was at war, or during any national emergency the existence of which should be declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States should without the approval of the board be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag; that no vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, or owned by any person a citizen of the United States, except one which the board was prohibited from purchasing, should be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag unless such vessel should be first tendered to the board at the price in good faith offered by others, or, if no such offer, at a fair price to be determined as provided in section 10; that any vessel sold, chartered, leased, transferred, or operated in violation of this section should be forfeited to the United States and anyone violating the section deemed guilty of misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment of not more than five years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

Section 10 provided for the taking of vessels purchased, leased, or chartered from the board by the President for military or naval purposes and defined the method of compensation.

Section 11 provided that the board, if in its judgment such action was necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, might form under the laws of the District of Columbia one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States; that the total capital stock thereof should not exceed $50,000,000; that the board might, for and on behalf of the United States, subscribe to, purchase, and vote not less than a majority of the capital stock of any such corporation, and do all other things in regard thereto necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the purposes of this act; that the board, with the approval of the President, might sell any or all of the stock of the United States in such corporation but at no time should be a minority stockholder: Provided, That no corporation in which the United States was a stockholder, formed under the authority of this section, should engage in the operation of any vessel constructed, purchased, leased, chartered, or transferred under the authority of this act unless the board should be unable, after a bona fide effort, to contract with any person, a citizen of the United States, for the purchase, lease, or charter of such vessels under such terms and conditions as might be prescribed by the board; that the offer of vessels to private capital should be through public competition and that the consent of the President should be essential to their operation by the corporation; that the life of any corporation formed under this section should be limited to five years after the close of the European war, its vessels and property reverting to the board; that the board might sell, lease, or charter such vessels as provided in section 7 and should dispose of property other than vessels on best available terms, depositing net proceeds, after payment of debts and obligations, in the Treasury to the board's credit.

Section 12 provided that the board should investigate the relative cost of building and operating merchant vessels here and abroad, rules of construction and classification, marine insurance with a view to an American system of substantial benefit to an American merchant marine, navigation laws with a view to amendment by Congress, vessel mortgages with a view to the improvement of security, and should on or before the 1st day of each December make a report to Congress including its recommendations, results of investigations, summary of its transactions, statement of expenditures and receipts, operations of any corporation formed under the act, and names and compensation of all persons employed by board.

Section 13 provided that Panama Canal bonds to the extent of $50,000,000 already authorized might be issued to aid the board in carrying out sections 5 and 11, that the proceeds of said bonds and net proceeds of all sales, charters, and leases of vessels and sales of stock by the board and all other moneys received by it from any source should be covered into the Treasury to the board's credit, and were thereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of carrying out sections 5 and 11.

Section 14 prohibited any common carrier by water from giving rebates to shippers, using what are known as "fighting ships"—namely, ships used for the purpose of excluding, preventing, or reducing competition by driving another carrier out of the trade; also prohibited retaliations and discriminations against shippers, and so forth, under penalty of a fine not exceeding $25,000 for each offense.

Section 14a provided that the board might on its own initiative, or on complaint, after due notice and hearing, determine whether any person not a citizen of the United States and engaged in transporting property or passengers by water has violated section 14 or entered into agreements prejudicial to American carriers, and on finding against such person may deny his ships entry to United States ports, and so forth.

Section 15 required memoranda of all agreements between carriers by water relating to rates, fares, pools, traffic divisions and arrangements, understandings, conferences, and so forth, to be filed with the board, which was authorized to disapprove, cancel, or modify any agreement, or any modification or cancellation thereof, whether or not previously approved by it, that it found to be unjustly discriminatory or unfair as between carriers, shippers, exporters, importers, or ports, or between exporters from the United States and their foreign competitors, or to operate to the detriment of the commerce of the United States, or to be in violation of this act, the board being required to approve all other agreements, modifications, or cancellations. This section provided further that agreements existing at the time of the organization of the board should be lawful until disapproved by the board; that agreements made after the organization of the board should be lawful only when and as long as approved by the board; that agreements approved by the board should not be subject to the antitrust laws.

Section 16 prohibited carriers by water from giving undue shipping preferences and advantages to persons or localities, forbade the use of unfair means and devices to obtain lower rates, and so forth, and the attempt to secure marine insurance advantages over competitors.

Section 17 prohibits common carriers by water in foreign commerce from charging discriminatory rates or rates prejudicial to American exporters, and requires them and all other persons subject to this act to observe reasonable practices in receiving, handling, storing, and delivering freight.

Section 18 provided that common carriers by water in interstate commerce must observe just and reasonable classifications, rates, fares, practices, and so forth; that their maximum rates, fares, and so forth, must be filed with the board and kept open to the public, and that no higher rates than those published should be charged; that the board may, if it finds published rates, and so forth, unjust or unreasonable, prescribe reasonable maximum rates, classifications, and so forth.

Section 19 provided that when a common carrier by water in interstate commerce reduced rates below a fair and unremunerative basis with intent to injure a competitor it should not increase such rates unless after hearing the board found that such proposed increase rested on changed conditions other than the elimination of said competition.

Section 20 prohibits the disclosure by carriers of information relating to property transported which might be detrimental to shipper or consignee, and so forth.

Section 21 authorizes the board to require periodical or special reports, filing of rates, charges, memoranda, and so forth, at any time by any carrier or other person subject to this act relating to transactions within the jurisdiction of the board.

Sections 22, 23, 24, and 25 authorize the board on its own motion or on complaint by any person to investigate violations of this act and award reparations, render decisions, and so forth, subject to review by courts of competent jurisdiction.

Section 26 provided that the board should have power, and that it should be its duty whenever complaint should be made to it, to investigate the action of any foreign government with respect to the privileges afforded and burdens imposed on vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade whenever it should appear that the laws, regulations, or practices of any foreign government operated in such manner that vessels of the United States were not accorded equal privileges in foreign trade with vessels of such foreign countries or vessels of other foreign countries, either in trade to or from the ports of such foreign country or in respect of the passage or transportation through such foreign country of passengers or goods intended for shipment or transportation in such vessels of the United States, either to or from ports of such foreign country or to or from ports of other foreign countries; that it should be the duty of the board to report the results of its investigation to the President with its recommendations, and that the President was authorized and empowered to secure by diplomatic action equal privileges for vessels of the United States engaged in such foreign trade; that if the President should be unable by such diplomatic action to secure such equal privileges he should advise Congress as to the facts and his conclusions by a special message, if he deemed such a step important in the public interest, in order that proper action might be taken thereon.

Sections 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31 provided the board with the power to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, examine witnesses, and so forth, and provided also for the enforcement and review of the board's orders and decisions by the courts.

Section 33 provided that this act should not be construed to affect the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission nor to confer on the board concurrent power or jurisdiction over any matter within the jurisdiction or power of such commission, nor to apply to intrastate commerce.

Section 34 provided that if any part of this act should be held unconstitutional the other parts should not be affected.

Section 35 appropriated $100,000 to defray the expense of establishing and maintaining the board for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, including payment of salaries.

Section 36 authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to refuse clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he should have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refused or declined to accept or receive freight or cargo in good condition tendered for such port of destination or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, by any citizen of the United States, unless the same was fully laden and had no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle, or unless such freight or cargo consisted of merchandise for which such vessel or vehicle was not adaptable.

Sections 37 to 44, comprising the remainder of the act, were added by the shipping act of 1918 to establish prohibitions and restrictions on foreign interests in vessels under American jurisdiction during war or any national emergency proclaimed by the President.

I have set forth the shipping act of 1916 in considerable detail because a knowledge of its provisions is essential to a clear understanding of the history of our present merchant marine.

Under authority of this act—the act of 1916—President Wilson on December 22, 1916, nominated as commissioners of the Shipping Board Messrs. William Denman, of California; Bernard N. Baker, of Maryland; John A. Donald, of New York; John B. White, of Missouri; and Theodore Brent, of Louisiana. The Senate confirmed Messrs. Denman, Baker, White, and Brent on January 19, 1917, and John A. Donald on January 23, 1917. The President accepted the resignation of Commissioner Baker on January 26, 1917, and the board was formally organized with Mr. Denman as its first chairman on January 30, 1917. Raymond B. Stevens, of New Hampshire, was nominated on March 12, 1917, as commissioner to succeed Baker, and the appointment was confirmed on March 15, 1917. The resignations of Commissioners Denman and White were accepted on July 24, 1917. On the same day the President nominated as their successors Edward N. Hurley, of Illinois, and Bainbridge Colby, of

New York, these nominations being confirmed on July 5 and August 8, 1917, respectively. Commissioner Brent's resignation was accepted on July 26, 1917, and Charles R. Page, of California, was nominated in his place on September 29, 1917, his confirmation following on October 3, 1917.

The board elected Commissioner Hurley as chairman and Commissioner Stevens as vice chairman on July 27, 1917.

The board since its organization had taken on a dual status. It was organized under the act of 1916 to promote in time of peace an American merchant marine and to regulate foreign and domestic shipping. It was given by subsequent legislation emergency powers to meet the shipping problems of the war, the board acting in this regard solely as the agent of the President.

The board's war powers were exercised mainly through the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, a corporation authorized by the act of 1916. This corporation was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, under authority of the act of 1916, with a capital of $50,000,000 on April 16, 1917, and was charged by the board with the carrying out of the board's construction program. The war powers for construction of vessels conferred on the President by the urgent deficiencies appropriation act of June 15, 1917, were delegated to the corporation by Executive order and the funds provided by that act for vessel construction were assigned to it.

The Emergency Fleet Corporation, with all its stock held by the Government, except that owned by qualifying trustees, began one of the greatest construction projects ever essayed by mortals. Within six months it framed an organization of more than 1,000 employees, including a large number of technical experts who gave up more lucrative positions to assist in this notable project. Within six or seven months it was supervising from 16 offices, and in 116 shipyards the construction of over 1,000 vessels, disbursing funds for this construction at the rate of more than a billion dollars per annum, and handling virtually all the shipbuilding of the country. Its program called for the completion in 1918 of eight times as much tonnage as had been delivered in this country in 1916. The corporation faced the necessity of building new yards as well as ships, because existing yards were being used by American shipbuilders when we entered the war in building vessels for foreign account, mainly British and Norwegian. To meet the new and urgent demand it was arranged to build mainly in new yards large numbers of wooden ships, as it was found that this could be done without retarding the program for steel ships. Difficulties were had in procuring proper lumber but these were overcome. Designs were standardized for the steel ships. To secure unified control of shipyards and expedite construction the Emergency Fleet Corporation requisitioned on August 3, 1917, under presidential order of July 11, 1917, following an act of Congress, all steel ships then being built in this country of over 2,500 tons dead weight. Four hundred and thirteen steel ships were thus taken over whose tonnage when finished amounted to 2,937,808. Thirty-three of these, with a total tonnage of 257,575, had been finished at the end of October, 1917, the rest having an estimate of completion in 18 months. Methods of compensating shipbuilders had been agreed upon and negotiations were in progress with former owners as to their compensation. On October 31, 1917, 375 wooden ships, with a tonnage of 1,330,900, were under contract for construction; 305 steel ships, with a tonnage of 2,283,000; 58 composite ships, with a tonnage of 207,000. Adding the steel ships requisitioned as described above we had under way on October 31, 1917, in little more than six months after the organization of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, 1,151 vessels of all kinds, with a total tonnage of 6,758,708.

Contracts were being negotiated for 199 additional steel ships with a total dead-weight tonnage of 1,100,000. Funds appropriated or authorized at that time amounted to $1,319,000,000. This meant roughly an average cost of about $190 a ton, a cost far less than would have been incurred under ordinary competitive conditions in that time of general inflation, due to the war. Indeed, ships were selling in private trade at $300 a ton and over. More difficult, however, than the placing of construction contracts and the disbursement of funds was the assembling, keeping, and training of the vast number of needed workers. Here the Emergency Fleet Corporation had the assistance of the Labor Department. The corporation established an industrial service department of its own, and this department, with the cooperation of the Department of Labor, established shipbuilding recruiting centers and soon developed an effective system of securing men for the shipbuilding service. A weekly man-power audit of each shipyard was devised which did much to end the practice of employing from two to six men for each job in a year. New and better standards of employment were created. The heads of the international labor unions aided the corporation in establishing a system of industrial education. At Newport was established an instructor training center, to which from 75 to 150 skilled mechanics were sent from selected yards for six-weeks' courses in the art of training recruits. The housing of workmen in the new yards was another problem which the corporation had to meet.

As the steel vessels requisitioned on August 3, 1917, were completed the title was retained in the United States with the purpose of diverting them or an equivalent tonnage to the allied service. The owners were given opportunity to resume title provided they would yield to the board the use of the vessels for the war and six months thereafter at rate of requisition, the board to be reimbursed by them for expenditures in securing completion and all claims arising out of the process of requisition to be waived. This arrangement meant a substantial reduction in the cost of the ship-construction program and easier conditions for owners.

By Executive order following emergency shipping legislation by Congress the board was empowered to requisition ships already completed, and to operate, manage, and dispose of vessels requisitioned or otherwise obtained, and by the same order the board was authorized in its discretion to do these things through the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Accordingly, the board assigned to the division of operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation the function of operating ships and carrying out the requisition program, subject to the direction and supervision of the board.

Under this arrangement vessels, unless engaged in governmental service, were handled as merchant vessels, were operated subject to navigation laws, to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty courts, and, so far as their crews were concerned, to the compulsory seamen's insurance law. Otherwise much of the Admiralty litigation would have gone to the Court of Claims, and persons suffering from collisions or similar injuries over which that court was without jurisdiction would have been without remedy. The first officers of the corporation were Edward N. Hurley, president; John A. Donald, vice president; Charles Piez, vice president; Raymond B. Stevens, treasurer; Lester Sisler, secretary; the trustees being Edward N. Hurley, John A. Donald, Raymond B. Stevens, Bainbridge Colby, Charles R. Page, Charles Piez, and Admiral W. L. Capps. It will be seen that the Emergency Fleet Corporation was, in effect, the board in the legal dress of a private corporation.

It was one of the war duties of the board to take vessels for military purposes, and this it endeavored to perform with the least possible disturbance and loss to merchant shipping. It was realized that transportation facilities had to be preserved for raw materials essential to military supplies, nitrates for fertilizer products, that coal was needed by war industries on the Atlantic coast and had to be carried by water on account of the congestion of rail traffic. The reason for the power to requisition ships—on payment of just compensation—delegated by Congress to the President and by the President to the board, was found in the rapid rise of charter and freight rates at the time we entered the war. Cargo steamers had time-charter rates in the spring of 1914 of about $1 per dead-weight ton per month. These rose to $13.88 in the summer of 1917 in trades outside the war zone, to $20 and $21 inside the war zone, the charterer taking the war risk. The time-charter rates for tankers rose from $1.70 and $2.40 in 1914 to $12.50 in 1917. A greater rise was seen in freight rates because they included war risk, while in the case of charter rates this risk was taken by the charterer. Ocean freight rates on cotton from Savannah to Liverpool rose from 35 cents per 100 pounds in 1914 to $6 in 1917; from Savannah to Genoa, from 55 cents to $10; with correspondingly higher rates from Gulf points to these places. On petroleum from New York to Liverpool rates rose from $4 per ton in 1914 to $50 in 1917, including war risk; on grain from 50 cents per quarter to $5.50. Larger costs of operation had come about. Special war bonuses were paid officers and crews of private vessels on account of the increased hazard. The war hazard also increased the cost of capital and insurance. War conditions caused also an advance in the cost of bunker fuel and supplies. But, giving due account to all these elements, charter and freight rates rose out of all proportion to them. These rates, representing an inordinate earning power, caused the market value of ships to rise from $60 and $80 per ton before the war to $300 and over in the fall of 1917. The board in preparing to requisition ships decided that these inflated costs and prices, due to war conditions, did not represent a fair basis of compensation. After careful investigation, they fixed a scale of requisition rates decidedly lower than market rates and reflecting what they believed to be the legitimate development of values since the opening of the war.

The board has been frequently charged with all sorts of inefficiency, and for that reason I am going into its transactions in detail, in order to show that during the war and after the war they were marked by the highest efficiency and by unusually accurate judgment. To prevent unrequisitioned tonnage and rates connected therewith from soaring to still higher prices and to secure the proper mobilization of all our economic resources so essential to our full part in the war, the board decided to requisition, under authority delegated it by Congress through the President, all power-driven steel cargo vessels of 2,500 tons dead weight or over and all passenger vessels of 2,500 gross tons or over in our ocean service; to permit them to continue in operation largely by their former companies, all receipts to be held for Government account, and the owning companies to be credited with the rate allowed by the board; to maintai.. control over all these vessels as to voyages, cargoes, rates, and safeguards in war zones; to secure in this way unified control over all shipping, so that war needs might be given proper priority, and protection of the nations at war with Germany against oppressive and destructive transportation rates. Aside from the requisitioning power, the board was without jurisdiction over rates in foreign trade or over interstate ocean carriage rates, unless the vessels were common carriers and were running on regular routes. In fixing rates for requisitioned vessels left in the commercial service or assigned to foreign governments the board was careful to see that reductions inured to the benefit of the shipper, and were not used as instruments of favoritism.

The training of officers, engineers, and crews for the new ships was another task of formidable proportions. A recruiting service for this purpose was established on June 1, 1917, with offices at Boston. The school-ship system of training deck officers did not work fast enough. It was decided to establish special navigation schools, supervised by the recruiting service, where men already experienced in seamanship might be intensively trained. Fifteen thousand men applied for training as officers in five months, only those qualifying by experience as seamen being accepted. The recruiting service established 27 navigation schools in June, July, and August of 1917, dividing the country into seven sections, following roughly the divisions of the United States Steamboat Inspection Service. This inspection service furnished inspectors to examine candidates for the schools. The schools were also aided by local advisory committees, composed of mayors, school superintendents, collectors of customs, and so forth, while shipping interests helped also as opportunity offered. The teaching force comprised teachers from scientific and technical schools, as well as experienced sea captains. Following the rules of the Steamboat Inspection Service, requiring two years' sea experience for licensed deck officers, a similar period was fixed for admission to these officer schools.

For the training of engineers courses were given at the instance of the board by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Stevens Institute of Technology, Johns Hopkins University, Tulane University, University of Washington (Seattle), Armour Institute of Technology, Case School of Applied Science, and on the steamer John Weaver at Philadelphia.

A sea-service bureau was established to put these men both on private and Shipping Board ships. From June 1 to October 31, 1917, there were 604 graduates from the navigation schools for deck officers, 416 from the engineering schools.

A large number of ships recently built were taken from the Great Lakes, among them 21 steel steamers for war service. Sixteen of these steamers were too long for the locks. They were cut in two, brought down in parts, and 12 of them reassembled while still afloat, a feat without precedent.

Another task before the board was the administration of section 9 of the shipping act of 1916, providing that before vessels owned by citizens of the United States or documented under United States laws could be transferred to a foreign owner or flag application should be made to the board and its consent obtained. The board was thus vested with what was mainly a war power, the object being to secure proper control of tonnage for war needs. In exercising it the board had to keep in view present and future military and naval requirements, transportation requirements for foodstuffs and products essential to production of munitions and military supplies, and requirements of private trade.

The board was also vested by an act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, with power to suspend the law excluding foreign-built vessels and vessels of foreign construction from coastwise trade, the act to expire 120 days after the close of the war. The purpose of this act was to economize tonnage and to replace coastwise tonnage diverted for war uses. The board was given complete control of the coastwise trade, its permits being necessary for all operations therein.

A further measure by the board to carry out the control of the shipping situation vested in it by Congress was the creation of a chartering committee which, assisted by the War Trade Board, handled the issuance of charters for neutral ships, of American steamers of less than 2,500 tons, and of sailing ships of all sizes carrying cargo from United States ports to foreign ports, the main objects in view being the inducement of neutral ships to carry a fair share of the trans-Atlantic trade and to reduce the high charter rates prevailing in trans-Atlantic, South American, and oriental trades.

Another task assigned the board by presidential direction was to repair and make ready for service the 91 ships of German registry, with a total tonnage of 594,696, which had been interned in American ports when we entered the war. Then Congress authorized the President to take possession of and title to all vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States under enemy ownership or registry at the time of coming within such jurisdiction, and to operate, lease, charter, and equip them for United States service or commerce. This authority the President delegated to the board, and the board formally assumed possession of them. The resolution conferring this authority was based on the power of Congress under the Constitution to cause the forfeiture of enemy property in port at the commencement of war. It did not provide, therefore, for compensation to enemy owners, but did provide for the appraisal by a board of survey, whose findings should be competent evidence in all proceedings on claims for compensation. There were claims of valid nature to be considered in connection with these vessels, such as maritime liens for supplies, for advances, wages of crews, mortgages to American banks taken prior to our entry into the war, alleged sales to American citizens or companies, and so forth.

The board, finding itself without power to control the movements of unrequisitioned ships, requested the cooperation of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and War Trade Board in enforcing protective measures for ships in war zones. The result was that a higher premium was charged by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for vessels not obeying the rules of the board's ship-protection committee and the Naval Consulting Board, and a denial of licenses by the War Trade Board to vessels of a type making especially hazardous their presence in the submarine zones. Sailing vessels were excluded from waters infested by submarines, but were allowed to carry cargoes in the coastwise and South American trades, thereby taking the place of steamers transferred for trans-Atlantic business.

In order to avert a threatened fuel shortage in the New England States, the board organized owners and operators of all tugs and barges in the New England coal trade into the New England Coal Barge and Towers' Association in the fall of 1917, with a supervisor appointed by and accountable to the Emergency Fleet Corporation. In this way the movement of tows was expedited and maximum efficiency in operation secured.

The board made careful arrangements to carry out the regulation of rates and practices as contemplated by the shipping act of 1916 as soon as normal traffic conditions should be restored. This function applied to water carriers in both foreign and interstate commerce. The former did not include ferryboats on regular routes or cargo carriers known as ocean tramps. The latter did not include carriers on irregular routes, intrastate lines, or carriers running only in inland waters. Carriers transporting only proprietary traffic were also exempted from regulation under this part of the act of 1916.

Inquiries from the board addressed to 800 water lines in order to ascertain the number within its regulatory jurisdiction mentioned in traffic publications elicited 654 replies, showing their status as of June 1, 1917, to be as follows: Lines dissolved or with operations discontinued, 91; operated exclusively intrastate or between ports of foreign countries, 97; operated exclusively on inland lakes and rivers of United States, 64; engaged in towage, lighterage, or ferriage service, 37; operating on irregular routes, interstate traffic, 107; operating as ocean tramps, foreign traffic, 18; engaged exclusively in proprietary or noncarrier service, 73; subject to exclusive jurisdiction of Interstate Commerce Commission, 13; engaged in regular service on Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay, 4; engaged in interstate commerce within purview of shipping act of 1916, 67; engaged in foreign commerce within purview of shipping act of 1916, 83. The number of vessels in the last two categories were diminished by a changed status of several due to transfer by Government requisition or voluntary alienation. The status of some of the other carriers was dependent on a final decision by the courts as to whether Long Island Sound, Chesapeake Bay, Delaware Bay, and like estuarial waters were high seas within the meaning of the act of 1916.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICHOLSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to inquire upon what date was established the status given by the Senator?

Mr. SHEPPARD. June 1, 1917.

It is apparent that a negative decision would reduce the number of interstate water carriers subject to the board's jurisdiction at that time to less than 70.

Certain difficulties existed in the fall of 1917 in the matter of jurisdiction over rates and practices due to provisions in the interstate commerce act, as amended by the Panama Canal act of 1912, placing certain water lines owned by rail carriers under exclusive control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. For example, the Morgan Steamship Line, owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., was subject to exclusive regulation by the commission. The Clyde and Mallory Steamship Lines, competitors with the Morgan Line, were not owned by rail carriers and were subject to the board for regulation of port-to-port rates, practices, and so forth, and were amenable to the commission only as to through rail and water business. Again, the board had no control over a carrier operating only in inland waters, but had control over any competing carrier operating between same ports and to any extent on high seas or Great Lakes. Again, the board had control of a regular line operating, say, between Duluth and Buffalo, but not of a so-called "wild" or irregular carrier available for service between the same ports.

The shipping act of 1916 empowered the board to prescribe just and reasonable rates, regulations, and practices for water carriers in interstate commerce, but not in foreign commerce. As to the latter the board could only see that rates charged by water carriers were applied without discrimination. Nor were foreign carriers required to file tariffs with the board. Moreover, these regulations were subject to the board's correction only in so far as they related to or were connected with the receiving, handling, storing, or delivering of property. The act of 1916 required water carriers in interstate commerce to file with the board and keep for public inspection in form and manner prescribed by the board tariffs showing maximum rates, fares, and charges, and were forbidden to demand, charge, or collect rates greater than those published, except with the board's approval and after 10 days' notice, unless for good cause the board waived such notice. Accordingly the board issued for consideration soon after its organization tariff regulations and furnished copies to all water carriers in interstate commerce.

The formal docket of the board showed two complaints to have been filed by October 31, 1917, to wit, that of Eastern Shore of Virginia Produce Exchange against Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic Railway Co. on account of alleged unjust rates on potatoes in barrels from river points in Northampton and Accomac Counties, Va., to Baltimore, and that of A. George Schulz Co. against Chicago, Racine & Milwaukee Steamers on account of alleged unjust rates on paper boxes from Milwaukee to Chicago.

By November 1, 1918, the Shipping Board, though the Emergency Fleet Corporation, delivered nearly 500 completed ships, which it had wholly or partly constructed, with a dead-weight tonnage of nearly 3,000,000, an average of about one a day from the enactment of the urgent deficiency appropriation law of June 15, 1917, conferring summary shipbuilding powers on the President, which he later delegated to the board. By November 1, 1918, the board had launched 747 hulls, with a dead-weight tonnage of over 4,000,000, and had laid 1,479 keels for ships, with a dead-weight tonnage of 7,742,230. Never before in human history had such an achievement been duplicated or imagined. In the accomplishment of this result and the performance of other responsibilities the activities of the board multiplied tremendously throughout the epic year of 1918. The personnel of the board remained during that year without change from what it was in October, 1917—Hurley, Stevens, Donald, Colby, Page. The personnel of the management of the Fleet Corporation will be referred to later.

As we have seen, the war activities of the board were based mainly on the urgent deficiencies act of June 15, 1917, and not on the original shipping act of 1916. The act of 1916 did not contemplate Government operation of ships as an ordinary thing. It gave the board, as heretofore stated, power to regulate shipping and, with the President's approval, to have constructed and equipped or to purchase, lease, or charter vessels suitable for merchant marine and naval auxiliary or other naval or military purposes; or, if it should deem the step necessary to the development of a merchant marine, to form one or more corporations under the laws of the District of Columbia for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States, the board, in behalf of the United States, always to have a majority of the capital stock of any such corporation. It provided further that no vessel should be operated by any such corporation until every legitimate effort had been made to secure operation by private parties on such terms and conditions as the board might prescribe. It provided also that the board might charter, lease, or sell ships to private parties. The war involved us before this plan had anything like a substantial trial. The urgent deficiencies act of June 15, 1917, gave the President practically unlimited authority to requisition, construct, and operate ships in any way he might see fit, the only practical limit being the appropriations accorded him for these purposes, and authorized him to exercise these powers through such agency or agencies as he might from time to time select, providing, further, that all ships constructed, purchased, or requisitioned under the act of June 15, 1917, or theretofore or thereafter acquired by the United States, should be managed, operated, and disposed of as the President might direct.

The President, by Executive order of July 11, 1917, delegated directly to the Emergency Fleet Corporation all his authority relating to the construction of vessels. He delegated to the Shipping Board his power to acquire vessels already constructed and to operate, manage, and dispose of all vessels theretofore or thereafter acquired by the United States. During the war period the board and the corporation based most of their activities on these delegations of authority from the President and acted as his direct representatives. By virtue of this war authority they directed the operation of practically our whole merchant marine during the war period as a Government enterprise. They dealt with constantly changing conditions, necessitating constantly changing policies. The board found its duties dividing into three principal phases: (1) Acquisition of vessels, (2) operation of vessels, (3) regulation of shipping and shipbuilding. The first included construction of vessels by the Emergency Fleet Corporation for the board, requisition of American vessels built at home or abroad, commandeering, purchase, or chartering of vessels at home or abroad, seizure of German and Austrian interned vessels, requisitioning of Dutch vessels. These proceedings involved many complicated questions of law and policy. The second included operation of vessels through the Division of Operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, assignment of Shipping Board vessels to other governmental agencies, to governments associated with us in the war, and to private operating concerns—control of charters of nonrequisitioned American vessels, and of neutral vessels—manning, supplying, and repairing vessels, reconstructing vessels for war service, salvage, and so forth.

The third phase embraced the regulation of interstate and foreign freight rates and discriminations, of wages, hours, and conditions of labor for officers and seamen, for employees in ports and water fronts, and in shipbuilding, exclusion of certain vessels from war zones, regulation of sale of vessels, of transfer of American vessels to foreign registry, of construction of vessels for private and foreign account, of admission of foreign vessels to American coastwise trade, and encouragement of American citizens to bring foreign vessels under American registry. In addition to all the functions above named the Shipping Board worked out in connection with the War Trade Board import restrictions to secure tonnage for war purposes. It established a port and harbor facilities commission to study improvement of port and terminal facilities, to aid the board in obtaining bunkering facilities, in arranging for the construction of dry docks and repair yards and in coordinating maritime with land transportation.

Besides the urgent deficiencies act of June 15, 1917, there were other war measures conferring still further functions and tasks upon the board. Under the espionage act, which also became law on June 15, 1917, the board cooperated with the Treasury Department and the War Trade Board in preventing injury to vessels in foreign commerce, in enforcing neutrality through withholding of clearance papers, requiring pledges of certain behavior, inspecting vessels, their equipment, and so forth, and in protecting our commerce from interference, and so forth. Under the enemy trading act of October 6, 1917, the Shipping Board cooperated with the War Trade Board in a program of import restrictions, tonnage conservation, and importation of essentials. Under an act of March 1, 1918, the Fleet Corporation was empowered to purchase, lease, requisition, or condemn land and houses for its employees, construct, sell, lease, or exchange such houses, and to make loans to persons and corporations for the protection of housing facilities. To secure these accommodations the Fleet Corporation established a passenger transportation and housing division. By October 1, 1918, projects were under way for housing at 25 shipyards and one turbine plant about 28,190 shipworkers and, in most instances, their families, the expense averaging about $400 per person, counting five to a family. The total cost for these projects contracted for by October 1, 1918, was about $58,000,000. This would be equivalent in normal times to a housing cost of $200 per person or less, certainly not an extravagant figure.

By Executive order of June 18, 1918, the President vested in the Fleet Corporation power given him in the act of April 22, 1918, to take over, lease, or control street or interurban railroad systems—cars, equipment, and franchises—necessary to the transportation of shipyard and ship plant employees, and the corporation undertook the exercise of this power wherever needed.

An act of July 15, 1918, amended the shipping act of 1916 by increasing the board's control over the transfer of American vessels to foreign registry or jurisdiction, and brought within the board's control all shipyards, dry docks, shipbuilding, or ship repairing plants, as well as the facilities and interests therein.

By November 11, 1918, the board had made distinct progress in repairing the ex-Austrian and ex-German vessels taken over by the United States.

The board undertook negotiations throughout the world for the purchase or charter of enemy ships seized or interned by other countries. Two ex-Austrian vessels seized by China were chartered until six months after the war. Two ex-German vessels seized by Siam were chartered for the war.

A number of Austrian ships interned by Brazil were purchased. The board chartered from Uruguay eight ex-German steamers interned in Montevideo, of 60,000 tons dead weight, for common use by Uruguay, United States, and the Allies, sending supplies for necessary repairs. Similar use for unrestricted trade was secured from Peru of five steamers and four sailing vessels. By September 1, 1918, the board had chartered 331 foreign vessels, of a total dead-weight tonnage of 1,084,986, 220 being steamers of 944,238 dead-weight tons, 111 being sailing vessels of 140,748 dead-weight tons. The steamers were largely of Danish, Norwegian, Swedish, and Japanese origin, while the sailors were largely Norwegian and French. The charters ranged all the way from a single trip to the duration of the war. Some of these vessels went into South American, West Indian, Australian, and Hawaiian trade, as well as the coastwise American, although nearly all the charters permitted trans-Atlantic use. After April 18, 1918, the board would approve no charter of neutral vessels leaving American ports unless they were chartered to the board. They were later assigned to various lines for operation in trades to which they were allocated.

The board cooperated with the War Trade Board and the State Department in negotiations for acquisition of ships from neutral and allied countries. Agreements were made under which the United States would license the export of food supplies and other commodities to neutral countries in return for charter to the Shipping Board of all the tonnage they could spare. Chartering agreements were made with Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. Japanese tonnage was arranged for by charter, purchase, and construction contracts. The building of ships in Chinese yards was arranged for. Larger types of vessels in the South American and West Indian trade were replaced by ships obtained from neutrals and transferred to trans-Atlantic trade.

A tentative agreement was made with the Dutch Government in January, 1918, for the use of some of their ships for periods not exceeding 90 days in return for supplies. As a part of this understanding Dutch shipping to the extent of 150,000 tons was to be employed at the pleasure of the United States in Belgian relief work and for Switzerland, it being agreed that each ship sent to Holland for Belgian relief was to be matched by a ship leaving Holland for the United States. The Dutch Government was to charter to us 460,000 tons of Dutch ships under the entire agreement. It had delivered about 300,000 tons when, in the language of the board, it "proved unable to live up to the conditions of the agreement." The United States, on account of its supreme military needs, then resorted to the power of a belligerent, known in international law as the "right of angary"—namely, the power to take for military use vessels of foreign register within its territorial jurisdiction. The President issued a proclamation on March 20, 1918, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to take over such of these vessels as were essential to our military needs, providing that they were to be manned, equipped, and operated by the Navy and the Shipping Board, and that the Shipping Board should fully compensate the owners in accordance with international law. Under this proclamation the Navy Department took over 87 Dutch vessels, of 533,746 dead-weight tonnage, in various ports of the United States, including Porto Rican and Philippine ports. The preparation of these vessels for our service was in itself a project of colossal proportions. They were in need of repair, were without gun mounts and extra gun-crew quarters, and were loaded, many of them, with colonial and South American cargoes, which had to be cared for. Their own crews had to be replaced with American crews. The rapid accomplishment of the project of putting this great fleet into American service by the Navy and the Shipping Board was one of the noteworthy achievements of the war. The board employed directly the new crews of such of these vessels as fell to its management and operated the vessels directly, departing from its usual practice of assigning vessels to private corporations or to the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

The board was further charged with settling terms of compensation for these ships, maintaining and repatriating the Dutch crews, and indemnifying them for losses, caring for and disposing of their cargoes, and indemnifying owners. The crews consisted of nearly 3,000 Dutch, Dutch colonial, and Chinese seamen, many of them penniless and without knowledge of our language. By July 3, 1918, practically all of those desiring repatriation had sailed. Many of the cargoes were forwarded by other ships, a few by the original ships, while some subject to quick damage were sold for owner's benefit. Negotiations were undertaken for proper indemnity to owners.

On June 13, 1918, the first vessel built in Japan for the Shipping Board was delivered, and by October 1, 1918, nine vessels of 72,990 dead-weight tons built in Japan had been delivered.

We have been dealing with the acquisition of vessels by the board through construction, requisition, charter, commandeering, purchase, and so forth. Great as was this task, that of operation was probably greater. By November 21, 1918, the board owned 455 ships of new construction, with a dead-weight tonnage of 2,468,892; 59 former German vessels, of 343,206 tons; 6 former Austrian vessels, of 35,262 tons; and 36 other ships, of 137,248 tons. Of the 81 Dutch vessels taken over, it had the management of 52, of 236,340 tons. It had chartered 328 foreign ships of 1,366,361 tons and had requisitioned 450 American ships of 2,910,766 tons. Thus it was operating through the division of operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation on that date a fleet of 1,386 vessels of 7,498,075 dead-weight tons. To accomplish this staggering task the division of operations developed one of the most extensive administrative organizations the world had ever seen. A glimpse of its magnitude may be had by referring briefly to the various departments of the division of operations. The division had a director of operations, having jurisdiction over all functions of the division of operations and maintaining personal contact with the members of the board; an assistant director, assisting in general supervision and charged especially with contact with the shipping control committee, chartering committee, board of survey and consulting engineers, War, Navy, and State Departments, foreign embassies and missions, and with various agencies of the division throughout the country; an assignments department, recommending and recording assignments to managers and operators and making notification of same after approval by the board, and having supervision in conjunction with the shipping control committee of the board of all freight and passenger steamers, divided by trades; a comptroller with general direction of all financial matters; a contracts and charters department, recording and checking all freight agreements, charters, and other obligations, and maintaining contact with the comptroller; a forest-products department, directing and supervising vessels handling timber and lumber for the Army and for the Fleet Corporation, and handling forest products for the general timber and lumber trade; a Great Lakes department, supervising management and operation of vessels constructed on the Great Lakes, its jurisdiction continuing until the arrival of vessels at Halifax; a marine superintendent, supervising all managers with reference to manning, victualing, and supplying, having direction of repairs and maintaining contact with the board of survey and consulting engineers; a department of maritime intelligence, having to do with filing all records concerning vessel movements, new construction, acquirements, charters, and like items of maritime information; a sailing vessels department, directing, in conjunction with the shipping control committee, all sailing vessels; a tanker department, directing, with shipping control committee, all bulk-oil carriers; a traffic department, handling the fixing and issuing of rates as well as claims for loss, damage, or overcharge; a tug and lighter department, directing, with shipping control committee, all matters pertaining to tugs, lighters, barges, and other harbor equipment.

I have already traced the personnel of the board from organization to the fall of 1918. As to that of the Emergency Fleet Corporation it may be said that Mr. Hurley became president on July 24, 1917; that Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals was appointed general manager on April 26, 1917, and resigned July 27, 1917; that he was succeeded by Admiral W. L. Capps, who resigned December 3, 1917, on account of ill health; that Mr. Charles Piez, who had been elected vice president of the corporation on November 11, 1917, was appointed general manager in December, 1917, and remained throughout 1918. By November, 1917, certain difficulties of organization had been ironed out, and all authority concentrated in the hands of the president of the board of trustees with power to delegate. After the German drive of March, 1918, demands for ships intensified, and Mr. Charles M. Schwab became general manager, Mr. Hurley and the board delegating to him full control of the construction work of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I have already referred to the remarkable record of the corporation in the matter of construction and what it accomplished by November 1, 1918.

Mr. Howard Coonley became vice president of the corporation in May, 1918, taking charge of administrative departments, and later Mr. J. L. Ackerson became vice president and assistant general manager. The board of trustees of the corporation were Mr. Edward N. Hurley, president; Mr. John A. Donald, vice president; Mr. Bainbridge Colby, vice president; Mr. E. F. Carry, Mr. Charles R. Page, Mr. Charles Day, and Mr. John H. Rosseter. These men accomplished miracles for their country and for civilization, and some day when partisan denunciation of everything Woodrow Wilson and his associates did in managing our part in the war shall have been forgotten they will rank among the outstanding figures of that stupendous conflict.

The board was charged by section 12 of the act of 1916 to make recommendations to Congress looking to the development of an American merchant marine, and to that end was required by that section to investigate relative cost of building merchant vessels in the United States and in foreign maritime countries; the relative cost, advantages, and disadvantages of operating in the foreign trade vessels under United States registry and under foreign registry; to examine the rules under which vessels are constructed abroad and in the United States; the methods of classifying and rating same; the subject of marine insurance and steps necessary to develop a marine insurance system as an aid in the development of an American merchant marine; the navigation laws of the United States and the rules and regulations thereunder; the legal status of mortgage loans on vessel property with a view to improving the security of such loans and encouraging investment in American shipping. Pressure for construction and operation for war purposes, radical changes in costs and practices, and other developments revolutionized conditions and made a report during the continuance of hostilities impracticable. The board set to work, however, on all the matters covered in section 12, and by the end of 1918 had made extensive studies and investigations.

In order to regulate and stabilize labor problems and conditions in water transportation the board employed labor experts and made agreements with labor organizations and Government departments. The object was to adjust differences between employers and employees without stoppage of work. The agencies through which the board handled labor questions were its Marine and Dock Industrial Relations Division, dealing with these questions in operation of vessels and in connection with marine equipment; the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board, an independent organization dealing with the construction field; National Adjustment Commission, handling labor problems of longshoremen; and the New York Harbor Wage Adjustment Board, dealing with operators of harbor boats at New York.

When we entered the war there were in the United States 37 shipyards building steel vessels, 24 building wooden vessels, of over 3,000 tons; the number of ways in the former being 142, in the latter 73. About 70 per cent of the former were building vessels for the Navy and many of the latter were not suited to modern shipbuilding. Immediate expansion of existing yards and the creation of new ones was imperative. By November 1, 1918, the ways in steel yards had grown through the efforts of the Fleet Corporation from 142 to 398; in wood yards from 73 to 418. Four of the steel yards were built and owned by the corporation and were used for the construction of fabricated-steel ships; that is, standardized steel vessels, many parts of which were completed in the factories furnishing the steel and assembled into the form of the vessel in the yard. They were called "agency yards" and were operated and located as follows: By the International Shipbuilding Corporation at Hog Island, Pa.; Merchant Shipbuilding Corporation at Bristol, Pa.; Submarine Boat Corporation at Newark, N. J.; and the Carolina Shipbuilding Co. at Wilmington, N. C. These four yards, with a total of 94 ways when in full operation, could produce more tonnage than the largest yearly output of any country before 1918. There were five other Government-owned yards built for concrete vessels and located at San Diego, Calif.; Oakland, Calif.; Wilmington, N. C.; Mobile, Ala.; and Jacksonville, Fla. Each had four ways and could be expanded considerably. The other yards had a total of 1,083 ways completed or in construction, 939 for the Shipping Board and 144 for the Navy or private work.

The closest and most competent supervision was exercised by the Fleet Corporation over the construction of yards through an engineering and technical unit known as the Division of Shipyard Plants. This division inspected and approved or disapproved all plans for plant work, supervised the construction of shipyards, industrial plants, dry docks, marine railways, storage yards, examined and passed upon grounds, buildings, water fronts, dredging, ways, handling and yard equipment, railroad tracks and equipment, streets and roads, water supply and drainage systems, power plants and distribution systems, installations of tools, and all other parts of plant and equipment essential to shipbuilding. By September 1, 1918, the Fleet Corporation had invested or contracted to invest about $150,000,000 in shipyard plants. The largest of these was at Hog Island, the estimated cost of which was $63,000,000; the next in size, that of the Submarine Boat Corporation, estimated to cost $17,000,000; the next that of the Merchant Shipbuilding Corporation, estimated to cost $11,000,000; the next that of the Carolina Shipbuilding Co., estimated to cost $3,000,000. There was also authorized for Scotch boiler plants and steel-fabricating plants an outlay of about $10,500,000.

The Hog Island location was in its original state swampy, dismal, and uninviting, but it was suitable for a tremendous shipyard on account of its protected interior situation near a great city, with a great industrial population and advantageous railroad connections, and also on account of its nearness to steel mills and fabricating shops. The contract for the Hog Island yard was made September 23, 1917, and provided for the construction and operation of a yard with 20 ways for 7,500-ton ships, 30 ways for 8,000-ton ships, fitting-out piers, shops for correction and replacement work, and a small amount of ship-steel fabrication. In the face of an unusually severe winter and other appalling difficulties the yard was 50 per cent complete on February 12, 1918, and on that day the yard's first keel was laid. When finished the yard covered 846 acres, contained 250 buildings, 80 miles of standard railroad track, 3,000,000 feet of underground wiring, using 20 locomotives and 165 autotrucks. The 50 ways extended along a mile and a quarter of water front, and there was a total water frontage of 20,000 feet. On these ways 50 ships could be built while 28 were being outfitted at the piers, making 78 which could be in process of construction at the same time.

The plans of the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation contemplated at least another year of war, during which we would be expected to increase our quota of fighting men abroad to four millions. These plans were well under way when the sudden close of hostilities on November 11, 1918, necessitated their suspension and reversal to a large extent, and brought about a fundamental change in the problems and conditions surrounding the board. The principal activities of the board were now devoted to the supply of tonnage for the return of troops and for European relief, the return of neutral and requisitioned ships, compensation for requisitioned vessels, reimbursement from War and Navy Departments for vessels used by them, and the sale of ships. It became evident early in 1919 that large supplies of foodstuffs must be rushed to Europe to save its stricken peoples from an economic and social breakdown. The food relief movement began in February, 1919, and reached its peak in May, when 264 vessels, of nearly 2,000,000 dead-weight tons, were in use.

In December, 1918, the chairman of the board, at the request of President Wilson, established an office in Paris for purposes connected with the peace conference. At a conference in London representatives of the Shipping Board and the American Food Administration outlined a program for European food relief.

On June 4, 1918, it had been decided to allow no American ship of more than 100 tons to pass to foreign registry, although a few occasional exceptions were later made to this rule. On December 12, 1918, it was decided to permit wooden vessels then being built in American shipyards to be sold to foreign-owned American corporations and to foreigners, except our enemies, and to permit the transfer of documented wooden tonnage to foreign-owned American corporations unless contrary to national interests.

Only in rare instances was this policy applied to American steel and iron vessels. From June 30, 1918, to July 1, 1919, the board authorized transfer to foreign registry of 253 wooden vessels, with a gross tonnage of 205,000; 34 steel vessels, with a gross tonnage of 47,203; and 12 iron vessels, with a gross tonnage of 14,652. The steel and iron vessels transferred were old vessels of lake-type construction and of no value to the American merchant marine.

The board relinquished on December 3, 1918, its control of the transfer of American vessels from Americans to Americans, the conditions requiring such control having disappeared. It also at a date following the armistice lifted all restrictions on construction of wooden tonnage for American or foreign account and steel tonnage for American account. Finally, on June 4, 1919, the board announced that on application construction of steel ships for foreign account would also be approved. On January 6, 1919, the board began the release of requisitioned tonnage to the extent of turning back privately owned American vessels of not more than 4,000 tons dead weight, except when required for military or food relief use. By June 30, 1919, the board had returned 457 such vessels, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 2,665,000. Where the board had spare tonnage, substitution was made of it with some owners until their requisitioned tonnage could be redelivered. On June 30, 1919, over half the chartered neutral tonnage had been returned to owners. Prolonged negotiations between the Shipping Board, the State Department, the British Government, the Dutch Government, and the Dutch shipowners intervened before terms of restoration were agreed upon as to the Dutch ships taken over by Executive proclamation during the war. The chartering committee, which had controlled rates during the war, ceased to function on March 1, 1919, and its work was continued under a chartering executive, who also served as tank steamer executive. After the armistice the problem was the maintenance of satisfactory charter rates rather than the enforcement of reductions.

After the armistice the board's division of regulations began to function more actively than was possible during the war. Its work was the regulation of rates and practices of water carriers in peace times, and was divided under four heads, to wit, formal dockets, informal dockets, tariffs, contracts and conferences. The formal docket covered complaints filed by shippers and others against carriers within the board's jurisdiction under section 22, shipping act of 1916. Six of these complaints had been filed by June 30, 1919. The informal docket covered any question raised by letter or memorandum and not by formal complaint, and alleging violations of the act of 1916, and which the board would attempt to settle by correspondence and informal conferences.

Sixty-three of these informal complaints were filed during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919. The tariff authority of the board, exercised through the division of regulations, was derived from section 18, act of 1916, which required common carriers by water in interstate commerce, operating on the high seas or Great Lakes on regular routes from port to port, to file with the board and keep open to public inspection in the manner prescribed by the board their maximum rates, fares, and charges, and which prohibited them from demanding, charging, or collecting rates exceeding those published except with the board's approval and after 10 days' notice, unless the board, for good cause shown, waived the notice. The division of regulations preserved and kept open to the public a file of these published tariffs. Carriers in foreign trade on the high seas were not required by the act of 1916 to file tariffs with the board. The authority of the board over contracts and conferences was derived from section 15, act of 1916, which required carriers and other persons, such as forwarders, subject to the board's jurisdiction to file with the board copies or complete memoranda of all contracts, agreements, and understandings regarding rates, traffic, pooling of equipment, or any other working arrangement. These contracts, agreements, understandings, and so forth, were of two kinds. First, the so-called steamship conferences which, in the language of the board, were "understandings among combinations of groups of steamship lines as to policies affecting operations, traffic, ports, and so forth," and which "in the past also involved maintenance of systems of deferred rebates which are now prohibited by law." Understandings supplementing these conferences were called conference agreements, being made between parties subject to the original conference and being based on said conference. All the parties to the original conference, however, were not necessarily parties to the conference agreement. The second kind of understanding was between carriers amenable to the board's jurisdiction, who had no part in these conferences, and those between carriers and other persons within the board's jurisdiction, such as those furnishing wharf facilities, terminal accommodations, and so forth, in connection with a water carrier. The board maintained a complete record of those contracts and conferences.

Through the division of operations the board continued in close touch with the United States Railroad Administration, realizing that our foreign trade required intimate cooperation between ocean and rail transportation facilities. The assistant director of traffic of the Railroad Administration and the assistant director of operations of the Fleet Corporation composed a joint committee appointed to handle relations between ocean and rail shipping, considering the following subjects among others: (a) Through export bills of lading; (b) export and import rail rates; (c) allocation of Shipping Board tonnage to relieve temporary congestion at certain ports; (d) joint consideration of traffic available to support regular sailings from United States ports; (e) assignments of Shipping Board vessels for railway operations; (f) wage questions involving railway floating equipment and Shipping Board vessels. The object of the board was to secure such unity between ocean and rail carriers that goods might be shipped from places in the United States to any place in the world with the same ease as to any point in the United States.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the board allocated to the Army and Navy 265 vessels, including its own and those it had requisitioned, of a total dead-weight tonnage of 1,713,542. Of these 168 were redelivered to the board, their dead-weight tonnage being 1,008,172, and 10 had been lost by sinking, having a dead-weight tonnage of 45,599.

On October 9, 1918, the advisory insurance committee of the board was succeeded by the division of insurance to handle the growing problems of insurance and to negotiate salvage and wreckage contracts, so that prompt assistance might be given imperiled vessels. This division followed as a general rule the commercial market in fixing marine and war-risk premium rates. The ships owned by the Shipping Board were multiplying rapidly, and this was another reason for a division to look promptly after losses. These losses pertained to vessels in operation and not to hulls in course of construction.

As the fleet of the Shipping Board increased, the question of the board's relation to our foreign trade began to be important. Nowhere in the shipping act of 1916 or in any of the war measures affecting the board was any specific authority conferred on the board to promote foreign trade. It was apparent, however, that the promotion of an American merchant marine and the operation of so many American ships in the foreign trade by the board gave it a deep and practical interest in the development of foreign commerce. It came in constant contact with foreign interests doing business with this country, and, moreover, found it necessary to use representatives abroad. Having no foreign trade department of its own, the board would refer foreign trade problems and policies to the proper Government department. It referred the suggestion of keeping an American committee of trade experts in London to look after trade development and possibilities in Europe to the Department of Commerce. Two of the board's commissioners, however, were on the foreign trade committee, an advisory committee charged with the duty of coordinating the work of the various departments in connection with foreign trade. The board could not appoint agents for American steamship operators abroad, but it investigated records and connections of agents in foreign countries, so as to have confidential information available for our shipping interests. In the course of the board's investigations for ship-operating purposes trade opportunities and probable cargo movements were frequently discovered. The board published a number of bulletins containing these results. In order to provide full cargoes for our vessels the needs of various trades were carefully studied, as well as the problem of regular liner service. In these and other ways the board kept in touch with the shipping needs of our foreign trade, and announced in its third annual report, its report for the year ended June 30, 1919, that the construction program was being thoroughly revised with a view to a properly balanced fleet adapted to all probable requirements. So we see that there is nothing new in what the proponents of the present subsidy measure say in reference to a balanced fleet. The board made a thorough revision of its building program with that purpose in view nearly four years ago.

The first step in adjusting the recruiting service to a normal basis after the armistice was to return to owners the passenger steamers used as training ships for the merchant marine, the board substituting for these steamers six of the wooden cargo ships built by the Fleet Corporation. The number of apprentice seamen, firemen, and stewards trained under the board's supervision for merchant marine service from January, 1918, to June 15, 1919, was 23,909; the number of graduates of navigation schools for merchant marine officers and of engineering schools from June 4, 1917, to June 15, 1919, being 9,762. The number of chief engineers for turbine ships trained in factories making turbine engines by July 1, 1919, was 77.

After the armistice the demand for crews for American merchant vessels was greater than it was during the war. To furnish crews and officers for all American vessels, whether operated privately or by the board, the sea service bureau of the Shipping Board, formed in July, 1917, had been gradually enlarged until it was the board's sole agency for such purposes. On May 1, 1919, the sea service bureau was authorized to charge $2.50 for each officer and man it placed on a ship, regardless of who owned or operated it, the charge to be eliminated whenever conditions might warrant. This bureau inspected vessels to see that living quarters were furnished crews in accordance with law. The placements of the bureau increased from 6,330 in November, 1918, to 11,673 in May, 1919. They began to exceed by far the placements of all other agencies. Before the war about 70 per cent of crews on American vessels were foreign born. By May, 1918, 65 per cent of the crews placed on American vessels by the bureau were American born.

The recruiting service maintained on each ship of the training fleet a modern hospital outfit with a surgeon, male nurse, and hospital attendants. Through the medical department physical examinations of more than 23,000 recruits were made between January, 1918, and June, 1919.

With a view to the intelligent regulation of ocean freight rates and of terminal companies the board ordered an investigation of the former under the direction of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, of the latter under C. O. Ruggles. In the matter of terminal charges the result of the study and investigation was a recommendation for stricter governmental regulation.

Some of the problems in this connection arose from the ownership of vitally important facilities by railroads, railroad competition in terminals, lack of coordination among railroads and between railroads and ship lines.

A ship sales division was organized by the board to handle sales of vessels built or acquired, final action in each sale resting with the board. A number of sales were made by June 30, 1919, transactions being had only with actual, capable, and responsible operators. On sale of wooden ships when made through a broker a commission of 1½ per cent was allowed, no commission being allowed on sales of steel vessels.

Commissioner Colby resigned on March 4, 1919, Commissioner Page on May 15, Mr. Henry M. Robinson being appointed ad interim on June 13, 1919, to succeed Page. Mr. Schwab resigned as Director General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation on December 2, 1918, Mr. Charles Piez as vice president and general manager on April 30, 1919. A reorganization of official duties and responsibilities followed. Other changes in official personnel occurred, so that on June 30, 1919, the Fleet Corporation had the following trustees: Hurley, Stevens, Donald, Rosseter, Robinson, Ackerson.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator just made reference to Mr. Schwab. He was director general of the construction work, was he not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He was placed in charge of the construction work.

Mr. HEFLIN. He made the statement that the vessels which were then being constructed would pay for themselves many times over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I might say in this connection that Mr. Farrell, another expert in steel construction, stated that the ships built by the Emergency Fleet Corporation were constructed at as low a cost as were any other ships in the world at the time.

The yard construction and enlargement program of the Fleet Corporation was virtually 100 per cent completed by June 30, 1919, the corporation having at its disposal on that day 72 steel-ship yards with 461 ways, 4 steel-tug yards with 21 ways, 87 wood and 7 concrete yards with a total of 473 ways, 53 wood barge and tug yards with 144 ways, altogether 223 yards with 1,099 ways. Shipyards at work for the Navy and shipyards building vessels of less than 3,000 dead-weight tons were outside the corporation's control and are not included in these figures. In tonnage capacity and in speed of construction the United States was leading the world when the armistice was declared. United States yards were building 48 per cent of the world's ship tonnage under construction during the second quarter of 1919, and 44½ per cent of the world's steel tonnage. The United States had under construction at that time a total dead-weight tonnage of 5,811,214, Great Britain 3,786,075, other countries 2,429,361. The United States had under construction at that time a total steel tonnage of 4,746,663, Great Britain 3,738,408, other countries 2,171,497. Our country was achieving records in shipbuilding never before approached, despite the industrial disturbances following the cessation of hostilities, a great reduction in the office personnel of the Fleet Corporation, intense political criticism, and other discouraging factors.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHEPPARD. With pleasure.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator that the records show that at Hog Island we laid the keel of one of the cargo ships of 7,500 or 8,000 dead-weight tons on one day and launched the ship 27 days thereafter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator for that contribution to the debate. The fact is that the popular impression to the effect that the Government ship program during and following the war represented a mass of inefficiency and wastefulness is entirely without foundation. It is due to the fact that from 1918 to 1920 a fire of partisan criticism was directed at everything accomplished by the Government, with the result that in the popular mind a distinctly unfavorable impression has been developed as to the administration of almost every such activity. I am trying to show that this impression, so far as our shipping progress may be concerned, is without any basis in fact.

During the eight months following the armistice the corporation completed and delivered ships with a total dead-weight tonnage of 3,192,833, more tonnage by 500,000 than was completed by the corporation before November, 1918. Before the armistice rapidity of construction was the main object; after the armistice restoration of shipbuilding to a normal basis. Contracts were canceled as rapidly as was consistent with sound business judgment. In October, 1918, when the maximum building program was at its peak, 17,399,961 dead-weight tons were under contract. On June 30, 1919, the program contemplated 13,616,836 dead-weight tons. Cancellations were made wherever it appeared that contracts could be canceled at less cost than the difference between cost of completion and probable market value. The board adhered in substance to the building plan submitted to Congress in April, 1918, and approved by Congress, no new commitments or contracts being made after September 26, 1918, except where necessary to carry out work already started. The Republican Party took control of both Houses of Congress on March 4, 1919, an extra session being summoned at an early date, but made no change in this building program. On June 30, 1919, the Fleet Corporation had completed and delivered 1,056 ships, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 5,858,164. It was outfitting 433, with a dead-weight tonnage of 2,010,949. It had on the ways 553, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 3,383,273. It was beginning to construct but had not laid the keels of 326, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 2,364,450. Its total active program on that date contemplated, therefore, 2,368 ships, with a combined dead-weight tonnage of 13,616,836, as before stated. It will be instructive at this point to go into further details. Of the 1,056 delivered ships 332 were requisitioned steel in various stages of construction when received by the corporation, 438 were contract steel, 274 were contract wood, and 12 were contract composite. Of the 433 ships that were being outfitted 14 were requisitioned steel, 201 were contract steel, 209 were contract wood, 6 were contract composite, and 3 were contract concrete. Of the 553 on the ways 23 were requisitioned steel, 393 were contract steel, 128 were contract wood, and 9 were contract concrete. Of the 326 with keels not laid 15 were requisitioned steel, 309 were contract steel, and 2 were contract concrete.

Had all the contracts entered into by the Fleet Corporation for ships been carried out, they would have composed a total dead-weight tonnage of 18,092,921.

Through the division of ship construction the board gave attention to the development of original designs of new types of vessels, approval of contractors' designs, approval of construction details, trial-trip procedure, records of ship construction and ship performance, and so forth.

After the armistice the division of operations of the Fleet Corporation began to lay out trade routes to meet the demands of reviving ocean trade. Vessels were being allocated to the different routes when the food and fuel scarcity in Europe demanded their withdrawal and employment for European relief. So insistent were these demands, as well as the call for ships to move coal to the Pacific for the Navy, that the board was unable in the spring and early summer of 1919 to supply sufficient tonnage for all ordinary freight cargoes seeking transportation. However, by June 30, 1919, the board was furnishing a large and increasing number of vessels for various trades, its shipping trades department continued to place vessels in the different trades and to make every effort to secure cargoes for them. This department made a special study of exports and imports of all countries and their usual routes of transportation, with a view to ascertaining the number and types of ships they required. This department kept in touch with cargo offerings in all home and foreign ports. An enumeration of the vessels which the board had in actual service on June 30, 1919, will give an idea of the manner in which it was meeting the demands on our ocean transportation. It had 197 ships, with a total tonnage of 1,204,953, in the European food relief work; 176 ships, with a tonnage of 1,175,614, in Army work, bringing soldiers home, and so forth; 28 ships, with a tonnage of 161,540, helping the Navy; 236 ships, with a total tonnage of 1,512,808, in the trade with northern Europe; 60 ships, with a tonnage of 315,547, in the southern European trade; 14 ships, with a tonnage of 66,096, in the trade with Africa; 6 ships, with a tonnage of 45,820, in the trade with India, Straits Settlements, and the Dutch East Indies; 77 ships, with a tonnage of 480,963, in the trans-Pacific trade; 188 ships, with a tonnage of 795,926, in the South American trade; 143 ships, with a tonnage of 462,937, in the West Indies and Caribbean trade; 105 ships, of 558,876 tons, in the coastwise, international, domestic, and New England coal trades; a grand total of 1,230 ships, with a total tonnage of 6,791,080.

The board, through its exports and imports department, had brought about the use of wooden vessels in the coal trade by all exporters, the diversion of boats unoccupied at any time to the coal trade, thereby keeping all ships generally employed, and promoting equitable distribution of board tonnage among foreign countries and American exporters, the establishment of the export coal trade on permanent lines, and elimination of speculation in board vessels in the coal trade. This department also assisted in obtaining bunkering stations for board vessels abroad and in framing an insurance plan for the board's wooden vessels that would enhance their desirability.

By June 30, 1919, the board had established line services mainly to European and South American ports, and others were in contemplation.

On May 1, 1919, the board established an actuarial department to study earning capacity of vessels by classes and types, trade routes, commodities handled, and so forth, with a view to greater economies and better results in operation of ships.

From the beginning of ship operation by the board to June 30, 1918, the gross revenues were $80,000,000; during the year ending June 30, 1919, $500,000,000, approximately.

We will now review the history of the board from June 30, 1919, to June 30, 1920. Chairman Hurley resigned July 31, 1919, and was succeeded in the chairmanship by John Barton Payne, appointed August 5, 1919. Chairman Payne resigned March 13, 1920, and was succeeded as chairman on that day by Admiral W. S. Benson. On August 5, 1919, T. A. Scott was appointed on the board to succeed Bainbridge Colby, who had resigned March 4, 1919. Commissioners Robinson, Scott, and Stevens resigned on September 15, 1919, April 5, 1920, and June 15, 1920, and no successors to these had been appointed by June 30, 1920. The board consisted on June 30, 1920, therefore, of Admiral W. S. Benson, chairman, and John A. Donald. The merchant marine act of June 5, 1920, had increased the number of commissioners to seven, had provided for the appointment of an entirely new board, the members of the board in office at the time of the act to continue in office until all the members of the enlarged board should be appointed and qualify.

To secure closer contact with, and a better development of, our trade interests in Europe the board began the creation of an European organization in June, 1919. Its special commissioner for Europe established headquarters and the nucleus of an organization at 8 Grosvenor Gardens, London, in that month. By June 30, 1920, Shipping Board representatives had been located in all seaports of the United Kingdom and Continental Europe of substantial importance. Before this organization, centering at London under the special commissioner, was established, agents of the companies managing board vessels had looked after these vessels in European ports. Some were diligent, but others allowed American vessels to be subjected to mishandling, delays, and oppressive charges. On account of the congestion and disorganization in European ports, it was difficult for individual agents to supervise our vessels properly.

The board's European organization, through control of movements, charters, cargoes, bunkers, supplies, repairs, and so forth, reduced the average turn around in part of Shipping Board vessels loading or discharging cargo, or both loading and discharging cargo, from 25.4 days for the United Kingdom and 19 days for the Continent in September, 1919, to 19.2 days for the United Kingdom and 11.3 days for the Continent in May, 1920. Material reduction had also been secured in cost of bunkers, supplies, and repairs.

The European organization established an operating department to supervise Shipping Board vessels in Europe in reference to navigation, pilotage, cargo handling, bunkers, ballast, personnel, and salvage work. The operating department set up branch offices in the United Kingdom at London, Liverpool, Manchester, Cardiff, Fowey Hull, Newcastle; on the Continent at Helsingfors, Stockholm, Gotenborg, Copenhagen, Danzig, Hamburg, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Paris, Dunkirk, Le Havre, Brest, St. Nazaire, La Rochelle, Bordeaux, Gibraltar, Barcelona, Marseille, Naples, Piræus, Constantinople, and Port Said. Traveling representatives covered other ports. This department was supervising on June 30, 1920, a total of 331 vessels—140 of these being in United Kingdom ports, 77 in continental ports, 114 in European waters. It would get in touch with vessels as soon as possible after they reached European ports and render assistance of greatest value. Masters of many American ships were unacquainted with local laws and conditions, and the foreign agents of such ships were frequently chosen with too little opportunity for careful action. The foreign operating department of the board would furnish American ships with latest aids to navigation, warnings as to mines, charts, and so forth, would see that berths were taken promptly, cargoes handled as readily as practicable, bunker and ballast provided in suitable quantities and at proper prices, and recommend diversion of vessels to less congested ports, thereby securing quicker discharges of cargo. This department was in position to render valuable help in securing coal and oil for fuel when local agents were almost helpless. Special storage for Shipping Board oil was secured at Brest and special arrangements perfected with the oil depot at Lisbon. American oil tankers were held at Gibraltar to serve American ships. This department also was of great help in securing prompt aid for stranded vessels, vessels suffering other mishaps, and in supervising salvage operations. It aided materially in looking after the replacement of crews, their behavior in foreign ports, and the treatment of the men by officers and masters.

The European organization also developed a traffic department, handling all European traffic matters connected with Shipping Board vessels, including chartering, demurrage, and cargo claims.

This department was divided into three sections, (1) Baltic and continental traffic, (2) United Kingdom and Mediterranean traffic, (3) demurrage and cargo claims. Its aim was to keep in close contact with cargo developments throughout Europe and to aid American ship interests to secure freighting contracts on as advantageous terms as possible.

The European organization created a construction and repair department to supervise alterations and repairs on Shipping Board vessels in European ports and to see that proper work was done and proper contractors employed. This department by June 30, 1920, had representatives in the United Kingdom at London, Falmouth, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle, Hull, Cardiff, Glasgow, Dublin; on the Continent at Dunkirk, Le Havre, Brest, St. Nazaire, Bordeaux, Marseille, Antwerp, Rotterdam, Barcelona, Gibraltar, Lisbon, Genoa, Naples, Hamburg, Danzig, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Gotenborg. It maintained a stock of machinery spares and ship's equipment at Falmouth. It held in readiness the Shipping Board tug Goliath to help disabled ships into port. Its duties included inspection of repair lists of ship officers and elimination of work not essential to efficiency or seaworthiness. It rendered substantial service in helping ships to avoid delays on repairs, recommending less congested ports for the work, and so forth. By June 30, 1920, this department had supervised repairs to 4,000 steamers and through its more efficient methods effected a saving of $1,320,000. It also made reports as to steaming results on vessels completing eastward voyages to European ports, advising as to competency and conduct of engine-room force, these reports ultimately reaching the board at Washington.

The European organization also was equipped with a supply department, which supervised purchase of all supplies in Europe for American vessels, with the result that great savings, better articles, and more prompt deliveries were secured.

The European organization was provided with a legal department, rendering aid in respect to many legal matters arising in connection with American shipping and American trade in Europe, having four main divisions—(1) collision and salvage, (2) general average, (3) commercial law, (4) protection and indemnity insurance; an intelligence department, the duty of which was to keep the Shipping Board and American shipping interests informed as to important shipping, shipbuilding, trade, and industrial developments in Europe; a communications department, handling all communications to and from the London office by cable, land, radio, or otherwise, supervising radio personnel, radio repairs and supplies, submarine signaling apparatus, and keeping the board at Washington and American shipping interests advised as to changes in radio work in Europe, location of new stations, use of new facilities, and so forth; and certain other departments essential to the successful functioning of the organization.

During the year under consideration the board reported on some of the subjects it was required to investigate by the act of 1916, to wit, classification and rating of vessels, marine insurance, navigation laws, and mortgage loans for ships. It was announced that the board had undertaken the redrafting and codification of the navigation laws. The board's recommendations as to some of the subjects last mentioned were embodied in the merchant marine act of 1920, especially those relating to ship mortgages. It devised and recommended a ship-mortgage act which became section 30 of the act of 1920. This act changed and improved the status of ship mortgages as security.

The board also devoted considerable effort to the standardizing of commercial documents, such as bills of lading, charter parties, and so forth.

During the year ending June 30, 1920, nearly all the former German vessels allotted the board were sold or chartered with option of purchase. All the freight vessels and all but 11 of the passenger vessels among them were thus disposed of, the remaining 11 having a gross tonnage of 150,152. The Austrian vessel, Martha Washington, was still on hand. Negotiations for sale of the remaining German ships were under way on June 30, 1920, specific authority to sell them having been conferred by the act of 1920. This disposed of the question that had been raised as to the right of the board to sell these vessels.

No proclamation having been issued by the President ending the national emergency and peace not having been declared, the board still had jurisdiction, on June 30, 1920, of the transfer of all American-owned vessels to foreign registry, undocumented as well as documented, under sections 9 and 37 of the act of 1916. Each application to transfer was considered on its own merit, the applicant being required to set out his reasons for the transfer, to show why it was not desirable to operate the vessel under the American flag, and to show the use to which he intended to put the vessel. Under no circumstances would the board grant the transfer if it in any way militated against the welfare of the American merchant marine.

The board, under the conditions before recited, permitted the transfer to foreign registry during the year ending June 30, 1920, of 305 wooden vessels with a gross tonnage of 155,686, 55 steel vessels with a gross tonnage of 97,879, 6 iron vessels with a gross tonnage of 7,967, and 1 composite vessel with a gross tonnage of 2,100, a total of 367 vessels with gross tonnage of 263,632.

Those who have sneered at wooden ships are pointed to the fact that but 600 of these went into foreign trade under foreign flags in 1919 and 1920, while the rest remained in American service. Of course this included many wooden ships not owned by the board.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas speaks about these wooden vessels which were transferred to foreign registry going into the foreign trade. Does he mean that they were used by foreign nations in overseas trade, or were they used more in the coastwise trade of these other nations?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They were used largely on the shorter routes and services in European waters, such as the Mediterranean Sea and the Black Sea. I do not think they were used to any great extent in the regular trans-Atlantic trade, but they were used in sea trades.

Mr. STERLING. But not in overseas trade in the usual acceptation of that term?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator means by "overseas trade" the trade between the United States and France or England, I do not think many of the wooden ships were used in that trade. However, they were employed effectively in various sea trades, and were not by any means confined to coastwise trades. However, the Shipping Board had over 80 of these wooden ships in the overseas, trans-Atlantic trade during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

During the year ending June 30, 1920, the recruiting service of the Shipping Board continued to conduct its navigation and engineering schools for training licensed officers, its sea-training bureau for training men below grade of licensed officers, and its sea-service bureau for placing on ships officers and men from all available sources, including its own training agencies. The 13 navigation and 6 engineering schools of the recruiting service, located on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts and the Great Lakes, turned out 5,673 graduates for the year ending June 30, 1920, of whom 4,197 were licensed—about 73 per cent—quite a number of the remainder going to sea as cadet officers and in regular berths on ships to receive licenses later. These schools, since the opening of the first school in 1917, have graduated 13,412 students, of whom 9,642 were licensed, 5,784 as officers; that is, as masters (263), first mates (430), second mates (1,788), and third mates (3,303); 3,858 as engineers—that is, as chief engineers (185), first assistant engineers (519), second assistants (1,478), and third assistants (1,676).

The board's school for training in operation of turbine engines graduated 236 men in the year ending June 30, 1920, having graduated prior to June 30, 1919, 136 men.

On May 3, 1920, the board started a school for the training of licensed engineers on the electric drive.

The sea-training bureau during this fiscal year utilized wooden ships in actual trade, with three stations on land, to train seamen, the total number trained from the beginning of the bureau in January, 1918, to June 30, 1920, being 32,335.

The sea-service bureau of the recruiting service, maintaining agencies at 21 American ports, placed 160,863 officers and men on American ships during the year ending June 30, 1920, nearly 66 per cent of these being American citizens and about 15 per cent being graduates of the recruiting service.

By June 30, 1920, the grand total of ships in the American merchant marine had grown to 3,404 vessels, with a gross tonnage of 11,278,741, this wonderful increase being due mainly to the continued rapid delivery of Shipping Board vessels during the six months following June 30, 1919. Of this grand total, the Shipping Board controlled 1,574 vessels, with a dead-weight tonnage of 9,358,421. By June 30, 1920, American bottoms were carrying nearly 43 per cent of our foreign trade in value, as against less than 10 per cent in 1914 and less than 28 per cent in 1918, and all this was accomplished without a subsidy. As will be shown later, we were carrying more than half by June 30, 1920, in actual tons.

Throughout the year ending June 30, 1920, the board continued to reestablish trade routes in operation before the war in the order of their importance and to open new ones. It carried the American flag on freight vessels to regions where it had never appeared, except at the head of an occasional tramp ship or had never been seen at all. By the end of that year the board had established 209 general cargo berths, affording 229 shipping services. Of these berths, 202 were between the United States and foreign ports and 7 between foreign ports. Of these 202 berths, 100 were from North Atlantic, 27 from South Atlantic, 54 from Gulf, and 21 from Pacific coast ports. Sailing from New York on February 6, 1919, the steamship Beatrice was the first steamer under the American flag ever to touch the West Coast of Africa. A regular service was established to that coast with an average sailing every 35 days to June 30, 1920. To meet competition, which was severer there than perhaps any other region of the globe, the service was extended from the West Coast to the United Kingdom and return, with regular schedules.

The services enumerated were cargo services exclusively. On June 30, 1920, the board established two combination freight and passenger services, one consisting of three vessels of a total of 25,680 dead-weight tons from New York to the east coast of South America, the other, consisting of one vessel of 8,500 dead-weight tons, from New York to south and east Africa.

For the continuance of its trade-route program the board had in operation on June 30, 1920, 1,294 steel vessels, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 8,253,416.

Throughout the year ending June 30, 1920, the board continued to extend its foreign supervising organizations so as to cover the world's principal ports. It also began to encourage American firms establishing offices abroad with their own capital by consigning vessels to them for handling.

The board continued through the year now under observation to exercise the powers of regulation conferred upon it by the shipping act of 1916, the preamble of that act having stated that one of its purposes was the regulation of carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States. As we have seen, the war emergency dwarfed for a time the regulatory work, everything being subordinated to building and operating ships.

The board exercised different rate functions through its division of regulation and its division of operations, respectively. The former passed upon the reasonableness and justness of rates after their initiation by carriers. The latter, while operating vessels on its own account, actually fixed rates, and since the Shipping Board vessels were turned over to private operators, kept a large measure of control of rates by agreements with operators and through the power of allocation. The latter's representative would serve as chairman of the steamship conferences which fixed rates in the various trades. These rates, if complained of, would come before the division of regulation for action the same as if made in the first instance independently of the board. The activities of the division of regulation in reference to conferences and contracts, agreements, understandings, and so forth, relating to rates, traffic, pooling of equipment, and other working arrangements filed under section 15 of the act of 1916, and subject to review and adjustment by the division, continued to grow throughout the year ending June 30, 1920, as did the number of complaints on the formal and informal dockets relating to rates, regulations, practices, classifications of commerce, embargoes, damages to goods in transit, refusal to accept goods when tendered, and so forth.

The merchant marine act of 1920 strengthened the act of 1916 by prohibiting use of deferred rebates or other unfair practices in respect to export or import trade, empowering the board to determine by investigation whether any person not a citizen of the United States was violating these provisions, and authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to deny entry into any United States ports of vessels owned, operated, or controlled directly or indirectly by the offending party.

During the year under discussion the board arranged for the continuance of the work of its port facilities commission by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.

On November 20, 1919, the Shipping Board consolidated its own marine and dock industrial relations division, which had handled labor problems connected with vessel operation, and a division of the Fleet Corporation which had handled those connected with ship construction into a new division, to be known as the division of industrial relations, and to deal with all labor questions with which the board might be related. It took about 60,000 men to man the vessels actually owned and controlled by the Shipping Board on June 30, 1920. During the war the board had felt responsible for industrial peace on both its own and all other American-owned vessels. To aid the board in this task the private steamship owners and the marine labor unions on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts voluntarily delegated to the board authority to fix such wage rates and working rules as it might deem fair, its decisions to be binding on all concerned. After the war it was tentatively agreed by all concerned that the board should no longer exercise this power, but should follow on its own vessels rates and standards agreed upon by negotiations between shipowners and maritime workers. To this policy the board adhered during the year we are now considering. At times it used its good offices to bring men and employers together. Partly due to its influence was the provision in the agreement effective May 1, 1920, between owners and the Atlantic and Gulf sailors', firemen's, cooks and stewards' unions for a grievance committee to aid in preventing misunderstandings and in securing harmonious action. From July 8 to July 26, 1919, a great marine strike by seamen held up practically all vessels entering Atlantic and Gulf ports, resulting in an advance in wages of about 20 per cent, which was still in effect on June 30, 1920.

A few days before the close of the fiscal year under discussion the engineers on ocean-going towboats struck in behalf of a demand for a third engineer, but were unsuccessful.

During the war wages and working conditions of longshoremen at most United States ports were fixed by the National Adjustment Commission, composed of representatives selected by the Shipping Board, International Longshoremen's Association, and private employers of longshore labor, and so continued by mutual consent for several months after the armistice. In September, 1919, the commission was reorganized on a peace-time basis, but did not include ports on the Pacific coast or the Great Lakes, unless by special submission. It did not include coastwise longshoremen, except those on a few lines in North Atlantic ports. Many longshore labor difficulties arose during the year we are now considering, both among longshoremen under the commission's jurisdiction and those without it, one of these being a strike which tied up shipping operations for about a month in New York and New Orleans and which was caused by what was considered an inadequate advance in wages awarded by the commission, an advance of 5 cents. Among the longshoremen outside the commission's jurisdiction there were serious strikes at San Francisco, Seattle, and Philadelphia, as well as among coastwise longshoremen at Atlantic and Gulf ports.

In the case of labor rates in construction and repair yards the board adhered in the main to the wages prevailing when the war closed, and this policy met the general approval of wage workers, although there were a number of strikes in some sections due to advances in some yards not being extended to others, and so forth. By June 30, 1920, the number of employees in shipyards had decreased from 289,594 on July 1, 1919, to 75,000. The construction program was rapidly nearing completion.

Through the second six months of 1919 the Emergency Fleet Corporation continued its construction work with results surpassing those of the first half of that year. September, 1919, witnessed the delivery of 150 ships of over 3,000 dead-weight tons each, a total of 810,386 tons. Before 1917 the greatest output of ships in any one year was 1,457 vessels of 921,324 dead-weight tons, including all vessels of 5 tons and over in 1908. The tonnage of steamships alone produced in that year was 722,436 dead-weight tons. More ocean-going vessels were produced in September, 1919, than in any single year in the history of the United States prior to the Great War. This one month's production was greater than the average annual construction in the United States from 1890 to 1916, inclusive, that annual construction being 476,092 dead-weight tons. There was much speculation when the Fleet Corporation was organized as to the maximum tonnage that could be produced in this country in a single year. Belief was expressed that 2,000,000 tons could be delivered in 1918, 5,000,000 in 1919. Great Britain, at that time the greatest shipbuilding nation on earth, had never annually exceeded 3,000,000 tons. The actual performance of the United States was 3,030,406 dead-weight tons in 1918, with 533 ships; 6,379,823 tons in 1918, with 1,180 ships; equal to three a day, including Sundays and holidays. By June 30, 1920, the board had delivered 2,070 ships of 11,622,361 dead-weight tons, was outfitting 124 of 888,675 dead-weight tons, had on the ways 95 of 869,775 tons (dead weight), was preparing to build but had not yet laid the keels of 26 of 294,900 dead-weight tons, a total of 2,315 ships of 13,675,711 dead-weight tons.

Of the delivered ships 374 were requisitioned steel, with a dead-weight tonnage of 2,594,166; 1,101 were contract steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 7,051,445; 589 were contract wood and composite with a dead-weight tonnage of 1,948,250; 6 were contract concrete with a dead-weight tonnage of 28,500. Of the ships being outfitted 1 was requisitioned steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 4,300; 101 were contract steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 854,375; 18 were contract wood and composite, tonnage not given; 4 were contract concrete with a dead-weight tonnage of 30,000. Of the ships on the ways 9 were requisitioned steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 88,800; 84 were contract steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 765,975; 2 were contract concrete with a dead-weight tonnage of 15,000. Those with keels not laid were all contract steel with a dead-weight tonnage of 294,900.

As the number of ships multiplied it became evident that increased dry-dock facilities were essential to the fleet's maintenance and operation. Frequently ships must be docked before delivery, and periodically all in service must be docked for underwater overhauling, repairs of damage by accident, stranding, and so forth. A survey showed the necessity of constructing 13 marine railways, 17 floating docks, and 2 graving docks. These projects were not profitable or practicable as private enterprises, and it became necessary for the corporation to aid in financing them. Funds for this purpose were provided by Congress in the sundry civil act of July 1, 1918, and the deficiency act of November 4, 1918. By June 30, 1920, 9 marine railways were complete and in operation, 2 were in process of construction, and work on 2 had been suspended. Five dry docks were complete and in operation, 11 were in process of construction; and work on 1 had been suspended. In addition, the corporation itself was constructing 40 pontoons from which 8 dry docks of 10,000 tons each were to be assembled. The 2 graving docks were complete and in operation.

The breaking of all former records in rapidity and quality in ship construction during the year now occupying our attention was due in large degree to the skill and energy of the shipyard workers. There were about 50,000 skilled mechanics in our shipbuilding industry when the war began, a number expanded by intensive training received directly or indirectly from the Fleet Corporation to 385,000. A vast supply of skilled labor was thus made available for private construction which itself had reached unprecedented proportions at the close of the year ending June 30, 1920. By that time 29 of the 30 vessels built in Japan had sailed for the United States, the last one, the Eastern Sword, being due for completion about August 5, 1920. One of the four Chinese vessels under contract had been launched with delivery expected in October or November, 1920. Nineteen combination cargo and passenger ships were under construction on June 30, 1920, designed to carry a cargo dead weight of 8,000 tons, passengers and crew, fuel, fresh water, stores, all amounting to 3,000 tons, on a mean draft of 30 feet, with a length of 535 feet each, an ordinary speed of 16 knots with reserve power to increase this to 17½ knots. The number of persons each could carry was 790.

The steaming radius of most of these ships was 14,000 nautical miles. In addition seven other combination cargo and passenger ships were being built, with about 12,000 tons dead-weight capacity each, 31 feet 9 inches mean draft, 14 knots speed, and steaming radius of 15,000 nautical miles. The board was always endeavoring to bring the fleet to a proper balance and to construct the most modern and efficient types of vessel.

A review of the financial accounts of the board from the beginning to June 30, 1920, shows a total appropriated for the board of $3,109,745,041.65, an amount smaller by $441,000,000 than the total authorized by Congress. The items for which appropriations had been made were completion of requisitioned ships, construction of ships by contract, plant and property, construction and acquisition, housing, transportation, dry docks and marine railways, foreign ship construction, original capital stock, and so forth. The largest single item was that of contract ships, the appropriation for that purpose being $1,938,451,000, the authorization $2,884,000,000.

As the fleet increased the repair department continued to grow in importance, its duties including review of designs for ships under construction, preparation of designs for large cargo vessels, approval of plans for passenger ships, acceptance for the division of operations of completed tonnage, survey of vessels to establish tonnage ratings, and reconditioning of ex-enemy vessels. While the war continued the intense demand for rapid production for war purposes prevented many new designs from being developed and confined construction largely to the best of existing types. With the armistice the situation changed and plans were at once made to adapt our shipping tonnage to modern and future mercantile needs. A review of all existing plans was made by home and field offices and changes found desirable were made in all ships not yet laid down or not too near completion. Thus the lessons learned from ships in actual operation were embodied in the ships in process of construction. By September, 1919, all existing plans had been thoroughly overhauled and revised, and most of the ships of the banner shipbuilding year of all time represented the latest and most practicable types of ocean-going vessels. The cost of modifying and adapting plans to meet the results of experience and observation was more than absorbed by operating economies thus made possible. New plans were devised for cargo vessels of the larger kind with a capacity ranging from 10,000 to 15,000 dead-weight tons, plans representing the most modern conception of economical operation. A 12,000-dead-weight ton tanker of an entirely new type, having expansion tanks at the side, the center space being reserved for the general cargo, was also designed. Instead of having one large room for the crew, as had been the custom, the quarters space was subdivided into small rooms. Thus better accommodations for the crew were provided, and the design in general was considered a distinct improvement over existing vessels.

The repair department assisted the board in connection with trial trips and acceptance of new vessels. Ships built by the Fleet Corporation always had thorough tests before they were delivered, tests arranged for the detection of defects in hull or machinery. Prior to the trial trips all vessels were equipped completely for sea work. Wood ships were docked, recalked, the seams cemented, and two coats of copper paint given the underwater body. Steel ships were docked and cleaned if since the last docking or since launching more than 42 days had passed. This rule did not apply if the steel vessels had been lying in fresh water. Vessels were subjected to three forms of trial—dock trial, full-power trial, and continuous full power sea trial. The dock trial lasted for six hours, with the vessel in ballast condition, during which the machinery, piping joints, and installation of equipment were carefully inspected and tested. Then the vessel was subjected to a six-hour full-power trial away from the dock in order to test its maneuvering qualities when without freight, to try out windlass and anchors, winches, steering gear, boilers, turbines, auxiliaries, evaporators, pumps, condensers, and so forth. A part of this trial was to stop the vessel, drop both anchors, run out all chain, so that fastenings could be examined, then to lift both anchors at once, so as to determine the capacity of the windlass engine. After passing these two trials the ship was delivered, subject to the third trial while loaded with cargo—the continuous full-power sea trial. The third trial lasted 12 hours for steel vessels, 24 for wood. Machinery, auxiliaries, and equipment were again tested while the vessel was fully loaded and in actual sea service. Loose rivets, or rivets needing calking, which nearly always develop to some extent in new ships loaded and at sea for the first time, were detected and put in proper condition. This last trial also developed the vessel's fuel and water consumption, speed while loaded, propeller strength, and steam-generating capacity.

Prior to these tests inspectors in the service of the Fleet Corporation and of the classification societies constantly supervised the work of construction. Also, surveys of all vessels to ascertain extent of running repairs and to make a record of their physical condition were made before they were turned over to managing companies under the new form of agreement that was being adopted as rapidly as possible after the cessation of hostilities. Further surveys were made by the board's representatives from time to time to assure maintenance in good condition and to prevent deterioration, and special surveys were had in addition whenever necessary to ascertain damages from collision, bad weather, stranding, and so forth. During the year ending June 30, 1920, about 1,500 surveys were conducted and Shipping Board vessels through this constant and skillful supervision in both construction and operation soon established the reputation of being built, equipped, and operated as efficiently as any ships in existence.

The impression studiously cultivated in some quarters that the Shipping Board fleet represents inefficient and wasteful construction, hastily thrown together and unadapted to the requirements of modern commerce, is without any real foundation. With so many of these ships on hand that hundreds must to-day be laid up during the present period of trade depression for lack of tonnage, the argument that we must tempt private interests to build more ships with generous loans and donations from the United States Treasury dissolves into vacancy.

By June 30, 1920, five of the ex-enemy passenger vessels had been reconditioned and placed in service, and six were in process of reconditioning, together with three cargo ships and three wrecking tugs.

By June 30, 1920, the board had the remeasurement of tonnage well under way, excluding from tonnage on which tonnage ratings gross and net, the basis of wharfage, dock, port and harbor, canal, and other operating expenses, were calculated, the inner bottom space used for fuel oil, stores, feed water or drinking water, light and air spaces, and so forth, and thereby effecting immense savings in operating outlay, and placing our ships on an equality with others as to fixed charges in ports, canals, and so forth.

On June 30, 1920, the board of trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation consisted of W. S. Benson, president; John A. Donald, vice president; John Barton Payne, and Martin J. Gillen. On March 1, 1920, J. L. Ackerson, vice president in charge of construction, had resigned and was succeeded by R. L. Hague as director of the division of construction and repairs, this division representing a consolidation of two separate divisions.

In the division of operations Director John H. Rosseter had resigned on October 31, 1919, to be succeeded by Director John E. Cushing, who resigned on May 31, 1920. Director Paul Foley succeeded Cushing.

By June 30, 1920, the division of operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation had under its control 1,502 vessels, with a dead-weight tonnage of 9,367,551. Over 1,000 of these were employed in foreign trade to the principal ports of the entire world. They were holding their own with the ships of other nations, and the American flag was once more the symbol of as efficient a shipping service as seas or shores had ever known.

During the six months ending June 30, 1920, the number of all American vessels in the export and import trade of the United States was 9,550, with 51,534,620 dead-weight tons, or 22,724,217 cargo tons. The number of all foreign ships in this trade was 6,008, with 35,397,080 dead-weight tons, or 15,273,967 cargo tons. Of the number of ships engaged the United States had 61.4 per cent; foreign ships, 38.6. Of the dead-weight tonnage represented the United States had 59.3 per cent; foreign ships, 40.7. Of the cargo tonnage carried the United States had 60.8 per cent; foreign ships, 39.2. The ratio of cargo tonnage to dead-weight tonnage was for United States ships, 44.1 per cent; for foreign ships, 41.5. In value American-borne tonnage equalled nearly 43 per cent of the whole.

On March 1, 1920, the method of rate making was changed by the adoption of a new form of agreement for the operation of Shipping Board vessels, known as managing agency agreement No. 3. This form of agreement was based on the idea of profit sharing, and cargo rates thereunder were made by conferences of Shipping Board managing agents, conferences organized under the supervision of the traffic department of the Division of Operations. Managing agents were permitted to make rates on full and bulk cargoes subject to current market quotations. After these new conferences began to function the rates division no longer issued tariffs. Four general conferences of the kind indicated were established—the North Atlantic, with headquarters at New York; the South Atlantic, with headquarters at Savannah; Gulf, with headquarters at New Orleans; Pacific coast, with headquarters at San Francisco. Subcommittees operated at the other ports in each district covering cargo services to all sections of the globe. The result was a complete steadying of rates in some trades and improved rate conditions in all the rest. Under the new system conference rates were required to represent a unanimous vote, all disagreements being submitted to the board. Even unanimous-rate changes, if drastic, had to be submitted to the board for approval.

It may be interesting to point out that of the entire Shipping Board fleet in active operation on June 30, 1920, there were 170 wood vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 628,384. About 50 per cent of these were in the trans-Atlantic trade, and 5 were operating abroad under the London office.

An inventory of the assets of the Fleet Corporation on June 30, 1920, showed a total value of $3,537,726.94, as against total appropriations from the beginning of more than three hundred millions less than that amount.

Reviewing the work of the Shipping Board to June 30, 1920, we may well pronounce it one of the most thrilling and stupendous accomplishments of all time. In rapidity of ship construction it shattered all existing records and reached a mark far exceeding anything that had been deemed possible. In adapting its program to peace conditions its achievements were equally amazing. In an incredibly short time it converted a fleet shaped principally for the carrying needs of war into an aggregation of merchant ships superbly fitted for the commercial demands of peace.

In 1914 the American flag had all but vanished from the seas; in 1920 it was mirrored in all the waters of the globe. Under the supervision and inspiration of the Shipping Board American merchant ships were furnishing in 1920 more than half our foreign-trade tonnage in quantity and nearly 43 per cent in money value. I am endeavoring to outline the complicated and imposing responsibilities, tasks, and duties devolving on the Shipping Board in the regulation and development of American commerce on the oceans and in the construction of suitable facilities therefor and the manner in which it has met them in order to show that its record constitutes an everlasting example of the highest capabilities of American genius, American vision, American skill. For the workers and the officials who performed that history-crowning feat there should be naught but praise and honor. It is a brilliant tribute to the capacity of the American people to execute vast national projects through the American Government.

It will be remembered that under the act of 1916 there was to be no direct construction or operation of ships by the Shipping Board, except for a period of five years from the conclusion of the war, and no direct operation of any vessel during that period until after the board had made every reasonable effort to sell, lease, or charter the vessel to a private owner. This act became law in September, 1916, but before its policies could be put into active practice we became involved in the European war and the shipping situation fundamentally changed. The war shipping acts of June, 1917, and subsequent dates gave the Shipping Board, mainly by delegation by the President of part of his war power, practically unlimited authority to construct, commandeer, purchase, lease, and operate ships, and to control practically all American shipping. It was under these war shipping acts, radically altering the policy contemplated in the peace-time shipping act of 1916, that the enormous construction program heretofore described was accomplished, and the immensely difficult and complicated tasks imposed upon the board during the war were discharged. After the armistice the supply of tonnage for the return of the troops, for European food relief, and for coal movements to sustain the Navy represented further demands growing out of war conditions, although active hostilities had ceased. As soon as it could possibly do so, the board began to adapt its plans and policies to the development of a merchant marine adequate to permanent and normal commercial needs and to provide for private operation. The board was returning as quickly as it could reasonably do so to the spirit and purpose of the act of 1916.

Such was the situation in June, 1920, when a new shipping act, known as the merchant marine act of 1920, became operative. A review of that act is essential at this point.

Section 1 of that act declares that it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States; that it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine, and, in so far as may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of this act, the United States Shipping Board shall, in the disposition of vessels and shipping property as hereinafter provided, in the making of rules and regulations, and in the administration of the shipping laws, keep always in view this purpose and object as the primary end to be obtained.

Section 2 repeals a number of emergency shipping measures enacted during the war, to wit, the emergency shipping act of June 15, 1917, as amended and certain other acts and parts of acts, and then repeals sections 5, 7, and 8 of the act of 1916, which have been already described.

Sections 3 and 4 increase the number of commissioners to seven and increase their salaries to $12,000 each. Section 3 reenacts section 3 of the act of 1920 with little further change, except to prescribe more specifically the geographical distribution of the board and to authorize a division of duties among the commissioners. This section also provides that the board shall have such other rights and duties not inconsistent with the merchant marine act of 1920 as are conferred by existing law.

Section 4 of the merchant marine act of 1920 provides that vessels and property acquired by the President under the acts repealed by section 2, or under the joint resolution of May 12, 1917 (40 Stat. 75), authorizing him to take possession of enemy vessels, except such as may in the President's opinion be required by other branches of the Government, be transferred to the Shipping Board—vessels in the military and naval service, including those assigned to river and harbor work, and so forth—to be exempt from this act.

Section 5 provides that the Shipping Board shall sell as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the purposes and policy of this act, to citizens of the United States, except as provided in section 6, all vessels transferred under section 4 or otherwise acquired. The sale is to be made on terms and conditions prescribed by the board, but payment of purchase price must be completed within 15 years after sale. The board is to take into consideration in fixing price the prevailing market price, supply, and demand for vessels, freight rates, construction cost of similar vessels at the time, as well as actual cost of vessels to be sold, and any other facts which would influence a prudent business man in a similar situation. Sales are to be subject to restrictions on transfer to aliens, prescribed in section 9 of the act of 1916 as amended by section 18 of this act.

Section 6 provides that the board may sell to aliens on similar basis as in section 5 to citizens such vessels as it deems unnecessary to promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine, such action to be taken only by vote of five members on inability after diligent effort to make a sale under section 5. Reasons for the sale are to be entered on the board's records. Completion of payment is not to be deferred more than 10 years after sale, deferred payments to bear interest at not less than 5½ per cent payable semiannually.

Section 7 authorizes the board to determine as soon as possible and from time to time thereafter what steamship lines should be established and put in operation from ports in the United States or any Territory, district, or possession thereof to such world and domestic markets as in its judgment are desirable for the promotion, development, expansion, and maintenance of the foreign and coastwise trade of the United States and an adequate postal service, and to determine the type, size, speed, and other requirements of the vessels to be employed on such lines and the frequency and regularity of their sailings with a view to furnishing adequate, regular, certain, and permanent service.

The board is authorized to sell, and if satisfactory sale can not be made, to charter such of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board, as will meet these requirements, to responsible persons who are citizens of the United States and who agree to establish and maintain such lines on such terms of payment and other conditions as the board may deem just and necessary to secure and maintain the service desired. If no such an agreement can be made the board shall operate vessels on such line until business is developed, so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such line can not be made self-sustaining. The Postmaster General is authorized to contract for carrying the mail on such lines at prices agreed upon by him and the board, notwithstanding the act of March 3, 1891, directing contracts to be made with the lowest responsible bidder. Preference in sale or assignment of vessels for operation on such lines is to be given to persons, citizens of the United States, who have the support, financial or otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines if the board is satisfied of the ability of such persons to maintain the service, or to persons, citizens of the United States, who may then be maintaining a service from the port of the United States to or in the general direction of the world market port to which the board has determined that such service should be established. Where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines and service shall be maintained by the board until in the opinion of the board the maintenance thereof is unbusinesslike and against the public interests. Wherever Government service is in operation in addition to private American service, Government rates are to be not less than cost plus proper interest and depreciation charges on vessels and equipment employed.

Section 8 provides that the board in cooperation with the Secretary of War shall investigate zones tributary to ports with a view to port development and development of transportation facilities in connection with water commerce, taking into consideration revenues of transportation by rail, water, and highway and natural direction of flow of commerce; also the congestion of ports, proper equipment of terminals, and so forth, with a view to advising communities; also the practicability and advantages of harbor, river, and port improvements in connection with foreign and coastwise trade; and the board is also authorized to submit findings to the Interstate Commerce Commission as to railroad rates and other conditions detrimental to water transportation.

Section 9 provides that the board shall require in connection with deferred payments that vessels be kept insured, as prescribed by the board.

Section 10 requires the board to create out of net revenue from operations and sales and maintain a separate insurance fund to protect the interest of the United States in vessels constructed or partly constructed and plants or materials acquired by or transferred to the board.

Section 11 provides that the board, during a period of five years from the date of this act, may annually set aside out of the revenues from sales and operations a sum not exceeding $25,000,000, to be known as its construction loan fund, to be used in aid of the construction of vessels of the best and most efficient type, on such terms as the board may prescribe, by persons, citizens of the United States, in private shipyards in the United States. No loan is to be for more than two-thirds of the cost of the vessels constructed and the board is to require security, including first lien on the vessel, for repayment, with interest, and for maintenance of the service for which the vessel is built.

Section 12 provides that all vessels may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair and, until sold, shall be managed and operated by the board or chartered or leased by it on such terms as are deemed wise in the promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine, pursuant to policy and purposes declared in sections 1 and 5 of the act—sections requiring sale at earliest practicable time; that the Fleet Corporation shall continue in existence and have authority to operate vessels, unless otherwise directed by law, until all vessels are sold in accordance with this act and notwithstanding section 11 of the shipping act of 1916, which terminates the corporation five years after the close of the European war.

Section 13 authorizes the board to sell any property other than vessels transferred under section 4 on such conditions as it may prescribe.

Section 14 provides that net proceeds derived prior to July 1, 1921, from activities under this act or the shipping act, or the acts specified in section 2 of this act, except amounts needed for operating capital for purposes of section 12, or for insurance fund under section 10, or for construction loan fund under section 11, shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the Shipping Board, to be available for construction, purchase, and so forth, of vessels within authorized limits; that after July 1, 1921, such net proceeds, less such an amount as may be authorized by Congress to be withheld as operating capital and less such sums as may be needed for such insurance and construction loan funds, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts; that the board shall as rapidly as it deems advisable withdraw investment of Government funds made during emergency under the authority conferred by the acts or parts of acts repealed by section 2 of this act and cover the net proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Section 15 provides that the board shall not require payment from the War Department for the charter hire of vessels owned by the United States Government furnished by the board from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, for the use of such department.

Section 16 terminates all authority of Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, build, requisition, lease, exchange, or otherwise acquire houses, buildings, or land under the act of March 1, 1918, provided that expenditures may be made under said act for repair of houses and buildings already constructed and the completion of such houses or buildings as have heretofore been contracted for or are under construction, if considered advisable, and the board is authorized and directed to dispose of all such properties, or the interest of the United States in such properties, at as early a date as practicable consistent with good business and the best interests of the United States.

Section 17 directs the board to take over on January 1, 1921, and maintain and develop all docks, terminal facilities, and so forth, acquired by the President under the act of March 28, 1918—that is, the former property of the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American lines. The President is authorized to transfer to the board at any time the terminal facilities, and so forth, acquired during the war emergency for military or naval uses; also to direct temporary transfer back to the War or Navy Departments when necessary; and no such property is to be sold except as provided by law hereafter.

Section 18 reenacts section 9 of the shipping act of 1916, relating to registry, enrollment, license, and documentation of vessels acquired from the Shipping Board, with some slight amendments. It omits reference in said section 9 to war or national emergency conditions.

Section 19 relates to the duties of the Shipping Board, and requires that it shall make all necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act; that it shall make special regulations to meet conditions unfavorable to trade arising from foreign laws, practices, and so forth; that it shall request modification of regulations of other governmental agencies affecting foreign shipping, except those of the Public Health Service, Consular Service, and Steamboat Inspection Service; that no regulation affecting foreign shipping shall be hereafter established by any Government agency, except those last named, until such regulation has been approved by the President; that the President shall determine the differences between the board and any other agency making the regulations before alluded to; that no regulation shall be established giving vessels owned by the United States any preference over documented vessels owned by citizens.

Section 20 amends section 14 of the shipping act of 1916 and adds a new section to that act—14a—both sections relating to rebates, use of "fighting ships" in beating down competition, retaliations, and discriminations against shippers, and providing how they shall be dealt with, and so forth. The summary given to these sections in my synopsis of the shipping act of 1916 covers the amendments made by section 20 of the merchant marine act of 1920, the act now under review.

Section 21 provides that the coastwise laws shall extend to all island territories and possessions from February 1, 1922; that the board shall establish adequate steamship service at reasonable rates prior to the expiration of such year and maintain such service until it can be taken over and operated on satisfactory terms by private capital, the President to extend period allowed for establishment of adequate service if it is not established by February 1, 1922, so long as may be necessary in the case of any Territory or possession; that the Philippine Government is authorized to regulate shipping between Philippine ports until Congress authorizes the registry of Philippine vessels as vessels of the United States, this section not to take effect as to the Philippines until the President by proclamation, after full investigation of local needs, declares that an adequate service has been established and fixes a date for such taking effect.

Section 22 repeals the act of October 6, 1917, authorizing Shipping Board to permit foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry and vessels of foreign registry to engage in the coastwise trade until 120 days after close of war, but provides that foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry, owned by persons citizens of the United States February 1, 1920, and foreign-built vessels now owned by the United States, when sold to and owned by persons citizens of the United States, may be admitted to coastwise trade while so owned, and also provides that the board is authorized to permit carrying of passengers between Hawaii and the Pacific coast in foreign vessels until February 1, 1922.

Section 23 provides that owners of documented vessels in foreign trade be allowed for the next 10 taxable years, as deduction from net income under war-profits and excess-profits taxes the net earnings of such vessels, determined as prescribed by the board, on condition of investing at least three times what would have been the tax, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the construction in American shipyards of new vessels under regulations prescribed by the board; that citizens selling during the next 10 years any documented vessel built prior to January 1, 1914, should be exempt from income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes on proceeds of sale if entire proceeds are invested in construction in American shipyards of new vessels to be documented under United States laws and of a type approved by the board.

Section 24 provides that all United States mails carried on vessels shall be carried, if practicable, on American-built vessels documented under our laws; that contracts for carrying mails on such vessels shall not be assigned or sublet, nor shall mail covered by such contracts be carried on other vessels, no money to be paid on the contract in case of violation of these provisions; that the Shipping Board and the Postmaster General shall determine reasonable rates of compensation in aid of the development of an American merchant marine and of a satisfactory postal service; that the Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts at such rates, within limits of appropriations made, notwithstanding the act of March 3, 1891, which directs that contracts be made with the lowest responsible bidder.

Section 25 provides that all Government departments, boards, bureaus, and so forth, shall recognize the American Bureau of Shipping as their agency as long as it is maintained as a non-dividend-paying organization with no capital stock for purposes connected with the classification of Government-owned vessels; that the Secretary of Commerce and the chairman of the Shipping Board shall appoint one representative each on the executive committee of this bureau, to be accepted by it as active members; that such representatives shall serve without pay, except traveling expenses; that the official list of merchant vessels published by the Government shall hereafter contain a notation clearly indicating all vessels classed by the American Bureau of Shipping.

Section 26 provides that cargo vessels documented under United States laws may carry not over 16 persons in addition to the crew without being classed as "vessels carrying passengers" under the inspection laws, but that regulations as to life-saving equipment must be complied with; that persons other than members of the crew shall be notified as to any dangerous articles on board or other risk of safety; that the privileges of this section be extended in the foreign trade to the cargo vessels of any nation which allows the like privilege to cargo vessels of the United States in trades not restricted to vessels under its own flag.

Section 27 provides that no merchandise shall be transported by land or water on penalty of forfeiture between ports in the United States or its possessions subject to the coastwise laws in a vessel other than one built in the United States, documented under the laws of the United States, and owned by United States citizens, or a vessel to which these privileges extended by section 18 or section 22, above, this section not to apply to shipments between places in the United States—not including Alaska—over through routes recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission and including Canadian railroads and water connections, nor to become effective as to the Yukon River until the Alaska Railroad is completed and the Shipping Board finds that proper transportation facilities will be furnished by our citizens.

Section 28 provides that no common carrier shall charge for transportation, subject to the interstate commerce act, of persons or property under any joint rate, fare, or charge, or under any export, import, or other proportional rate, fare, or charge based in whole or in part on the fact that the persons or property affected thereby are to be transported to, or have been transported from, any port in a possession or dependency of the United States, or in a foreign country, by a carrier by water in foreign commerce, any lower rate, fare, or charge than that charged, collected, or received by it for the transportation of persons or of a like kind of property for the same distance, in the same direction, and over the same route, in connection with commerce wholly within the United States, unless the vessel so transporting such persons or property is, or unless it was at the time of such transportation by water, documented under the laws of the United States; that whenever the board is of opinion, however, that adequate shipping facilities to or from any port in a possession or dependency of the United States or a foreign country are not afforded by the vessels so documented it shall certify this fact to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission may by order suspend this section for such time and under such terms as it may prescribe; that such suspension may be terminated by order of the commission whenever the board is of opinion that adequate shipping facilities by such vessels to such ports are afforded and shall so certify to the commission.

Section 29 provides that antitrust laws are not to apply to marine-insurance association, pools, and so forth, for marine insurance and reinsurance business in the United States and abroad.

Section 30 contains a number of provisions relating to ship mortgages, embodying the recommendations of a special committee of the board which had investigated this subject under direction of section 12 of the shipping act of 1916. Section 30 of the act of 1920, the act under review, is commonly known and cited as the "ship mortgage act." Its object, as heretofore indicated, is to improve the character and negotiability of mortgages on ships.

Section 31 amends section 4530, Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to provide that every seaman on a United States vessel shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master half of the balance of his wages earned and remaining unpaid at the time when such demand is made at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended, and all stipulations in the contract to the contrary shall be void, provided such demand shall not be made before expiration of, nor oftener than once in, five days nor more than once in the same harbor on the same entry; that any failure on the master's part to comply with this demand shall release the seaman from his contract and entitle him to all wages earned; that when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to remainder of wages due him, as provided in section 4529 of Revised Statutes, provided that notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552, Revised Statutes, any court having jurisdiction may, on good cause shown, set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require; and provided further, that this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement.

Section 32 amends paragraph (a) of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign-carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, so as to provide that it shall be unlawful in any case to pay any seaman's wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned them, or to pay such advance wages, or to make any order or note or other evidence of indebtedness therefor to any other person, or to pay any person for the shipment of seamen when payment is deducted or to be deducted from a seaman's wages; that any person violating this section shall be fined not less than $25 nor more than $100, and may also be imprisoned for not exceeding six months; that payment of such advance wages or allotment, whether made within or without the United States or territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall in no case, except as herein provided, absolve vessel or master or owner from full payment of wages after same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages; that any person demanding or receiving, directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment shall be subject to imprisonment for not more than six months or fined not more than $500.

Section 33 amends section 20 of an act of March 4, 1915, so as to provide that any seaman suffering personal injury in course of employment may at his election maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury, and that in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common-law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply; that in case of death resulting from such personal injury the personal representatives of such seaman may maintain similar action and the United States Statutes referred to shall also apply; that jurisdiction in such cases shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located.

Section 34 provides that in the judgment of Congress articles or provisions in treaties or conventions to which the United States is a party which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminating customs duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States, and which also restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory tonnage dues on foreign vessels and on vessels of the United States entering the United States should be terminated and that the President is hereby authorized and directed, within 90 days after this act becomes law, to give notice to the several governments, respectively, parties to such conventions or treaties that so much thereof as imposes any such restriction on the United States will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions of such treaties or conventions.

Section 35 provides that the power and authority vested by this act in the Shipping Board, except as herein otherwise specifically provided, may be exercised directly by the board or by it through the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Section 36 provides that unconstitutionality of any provision of this act shall not affect the remainder of the act.

Section 37 provides that when used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires, the terms "person," "vessel," "documented under the laws of the United States," and "citizen of the United States" shall have the meaning assigned them by sections 1 and 2 of the shipping act of 1916, as amended by this act; that the term "board" means the United States Shipping Board, and the term "alien" any person not a citizen of the United States.

Section 38 amends section 2 of the shipping act of 1916 so as to require ownership by United States citizens of 75 per cent of a corporation, and so forth, to enable it to operate vessels in coastwise trade and so as to apply same definitions to this 75 per cent interest as is applied in that section to the term "controlling interest" in connection with American citizenship.

Section 39 provides that this act may be cited as the "merchant marine act, 1920."

Having made this review of the act of 1920, let us briefly compare it with the act of 1916.

The act of 1916 contemplated Government construction of ships by the board in the form of a corporation whenever the Shipping Board might deem such action essential to a properly developed and balanced merchant marine, such construction to be had preferably in private shipyards.

The act of 1920 contemplated no new Government construction, except such as might have been begun under the war shipping acts and might be deemed worthy of continuance, but established a loan fund of $25,000,000 to aid private construction in private shipyards and provided certain tax remissions to encourage the use of earnings in further ship construction by private interests. It is also provided that all existing contracts or agreements should be carried out.

The act of 1916 provided that effort should be made to secure immediate private operation of all ships constructed by the board in its corporate form, and in the event of failure that the board should in said corporate form, a form that came to be known as the Emergency Fleet Corporation, operate such ships for five years after the close of the war, at which time the said corporation should be dissolved and private operation become imperative. The construction function was to continue indefinitely, not to supplant private construction but to supplement, round out, and complete the merchant marine from the standpoint of the national interest. The existence of such a function in the Government serves as a check against undue or extortionate costs in private yards and insures a properly balanced merchant fleet. The national interest—that is, the interest of the people as a whole—in a merchant marine is too fundamental and far-reaching to justify its entire delegation to private concerns. There are frequently instances where private interests would not develop a merchant marine as comprehensively as would be the case if the Government retained this supplementary construction function. For instance, a ship line in a new region might be ultimately desirable, but on account of initial risks and the uncertainty attaching to a venture in an untried situation private capital might never undertake the task, especially when enterprises in existing routes were constantly bidding for new funds and offering well-known security.

Here the Government could well exercise its construction function, see to it that the new and unfamiliar route was thoroughly tried out, and after firmly establishing it turn it over to private interests whose good faith and capacity were ascertained. The higher interests of the Nation as a whole would be subserved, its commerce permanently improved, although an actual profit in dollars and cents, the only profit private enterprise knows, might not appear in the Government ledger.

The act of 1920 contemplated operation by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, directly or by contract, until all the ships owned by the Government should be sold, and provided that the board should conduct all its activities with a view to the sale of all those ships to private interests on such terms as a fair return and good business judgment would dictate. To this end the act of 1920 repealed that portion of the act of 1916 terminating the Fleet Corporation five years after the war and provided that it should continue to function until all the ships were sold. In the meantime it empowered the board to establish new routes and, if private parties could not be found in the first instance to accept charters for vessels therein, to operate such vessels until the routes should be so definitely established as to make private sale practicable or until they had been shown to be incapable of economical development.

The act of 1920 strengthened the regulatory provisions of the act of 1916 relating to all our shipping, and enlarged and added other valuable functions, and added other provisions of distinct merit, all of which have been enumerated.

The principal change of policy embodied in the act of 1920 was to terminate construction power conferred on the Government by the act of 1916, a power essential, in my judgment, to the preservation of the national interest in a merchant marine; a power needed not to displace but to supplement, round out, and guard against the excesses of private enterprise.

We are now in position to examine the operations of the Shipping Board under the act of June 5, 1920, known commonly as the merchant marine act of 1920. I have already outlined the history of the board to June 30, 1920. I now invite attention to its transactions during the year ending June 30, 1921. As heretofore indicated the act of 1920 created a new board to consist of seven members, but provided that the existing board should continue in office until all the new commissioners should be appointed and qualify. Congress adjourned the day after it passed the act of 1920, and on the day the President approved it, June 5, and failed to make appropriation for the salaries of the new board. Under such conditions it became difficult to find men who would accept recess appointments to the board. As we have already seen, the board at the time the act of 1920 became law consisted of Admiral Benson, chairman, and John A. Donald. On November 10, 1920, recess appointments were accepted by the following: W. S. Benson, chairman, Frederick I. Thompson, John A. Donald, J. N. Teal, Chester A. Rowell, Guy D. Goff, and Charles Sutter. These gentlemen qualified in so far as they could personally do so on December 1, 1920, but they were not confirmed by the Senate, and on March 4, 1921, their terms lapsed. President Harding on March 11, 1921, designated Admiral Benson by letter to act as chairman until a new board could be appointed. On June 9, 1921, the new board authorized by the act of June 5, 1920, was appointed as follows: Albert D, Lasker, chairman, from the interior, term six years, qualified June 13, 1921; T. V. O'Connor, vice chairman, from the Great Lakes, term five years, qualified June 15, 1921; George E. Chamberlain, Pacific coast, term four years, qualified June 13, 1921; Edward C. Plummer, Atlantic coast, term three years, qualified June 14, 1921; Frederick I. Thompson, Gulf coast, term two years, qualified June 13, 1921; Meyer Lissner, Pacific coast, term one year, qualified June 11, 1921; W. S. Benson, Atlantic coast, term one year, qualified June 13, 1921. A year later Lissner and Benson received six-year appointments.

These gentlemen were all confirmed by the Senate. At the foot of the list of the members of the new board was placed, it will be noted, Admiral Benson, the man who almost alone had administered the tremendous undertakings of the board for many critical months with conspicuous capacity and fidelity. What a tribute to him and to Mr. Donald it is that the work of so extensive an institution was handled so ably under their supervision against a storm of misrepresentation and attack such as has been rarely seen in American history.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to say that was true, notwithstanding the fact that the law under which they were acting required certain important things to be done only by a vote of the majority of the members of the board. So that, not having a majority of seven on the board, they were unable to get a majority vote on many propositions which might have been worked out if they had had a full board.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am glad the Senator has called attention to this.

During the year now under review a new managing agency agreement, known as MO–4, was devised by a standing committee, consisting of representatives of the board and representatives of the managers. This agreement took retroactive effect as of March 1, 1920, and displaced the previous agreement which has been heretofore described and which was known as MO–3. Under the new agreement the manager was to receive a commission on gross revenues instead of a part of the profits, and a commission on salvage earned. Greater responsibility was placed on the managing agent for default of his domestic and foreign subagents, and the standing committee was to make suggestions as to interpretation of the agreement, the board reserving the right to make final interpretations and to fix salvage awards.

The War Department was relieved by section 15 of the merchant marine act of 1920 from payment of charter hire for Shipping Board vessels from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, the amount involved being $49,061,888.88. On February 1, 1921, a settlement was made as to all other accounts between the War Department and the Shipping Board and thereafter their relations were on a commercial basis. By other acts the Navy was relieved of charter hire due the board in the sum of $7,264,472.87.

During the year ending June 30, 1921, the board's committee on navigation laws continued the redrafting and codification of the navigation laws, laws enacted from time to time during the preceding 140 years, having in view not only codification of but recommendations of changes in existing laws.

On December 10, 1920, the board suggested the creation of a joint committee representing the board and the Interstate Commerce Commission, the committee to consider various provisions of the railroad transportation act of 1920, to study rail and water rates, regulations, and practices with a view to securing cooperation of rail carriers, water carriers, shippers, and ports, and to make suitable recommendations. Such a committee was appointed and was continuing to function at the end of the fiscal year we are now studying.

On April 15, 1921, the board created a division of field information to study such duties of the board under the shipping act of 1916 and the merchant marine act of 1920 as related directly to the promotion of a privately owned and operated merchant marine, these duties comprising the investigation of foreign discrimination and unfair competition against United States ships, of the commercial and economic aspects of port developments, of new trade routes and berth liner services, of an ample marine insurance system, of the status of ships of American registry, and distribution of information to shipping interests generally.

During the year under review the board allocated to the Pacific coast—Hawaii-Oriental-Manila route—the newly constructed 535-foot combination passenger and cargo vessels, declining further permission after June 30, 1921, to Japanese and Chinese companies to carry passengers between San Francisco and Hawaii under section 22 of the act of 1920.

Applications were received from about 27 shipowning companies for remission of certain taxes under section 23 of the act of 1920 on condition that net earnings in foreign trade be invested in new tonnage or put in trust for that purpose, the 27 companies agreeing to build about 737,000 tons of new ships. Nearly a third of this new tonnage was to be constructed by two Standard Oil concerns—the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Standard Oil Co. of California, and the remainder mainly by the larger shipping and industrial concerns. This shows how quickly the monopolistic interests take advantage of all special privileges offered from the United States Treasury. The result seems always to enhance their power and tighten their control of the situation.

Section 28 of the merchant marine act of 1920 was suspended throughout the year ending June 30, 1921, because adequate shipping facilities under the American flag did not exist for the transportation of the commerce of the United States to and from foreign ports and ports in the possessions or dependencies of the United States. It will be recalled that this section forbade lower rail rates to a port in conjunction with continued shipment on an ocean route than rates on rail shipments ending at the port, unless the vessel on which the shipment continued was documented under the American flag, and unless there were sufficient vessels under such documentation serving that port to handle its commerce with foreign ports. The complications engendered by this section may be easily seen when it is remembered that even the advocates of the subsidy do not hope to carry all our commerce or much more than half our commerce in American bottoms. Necessarily it will always be difficult for particular ports to secure complete service by American ships, and those having it at any particular time would have a vast advantage in the matter of joint rail rates over others.

The President not having terminated the emergency by proclamation when the fiscal year ended, American-owned documented vessels could not yet be transferred to foreign registry without the board's permission, section 37 of the act of 1916 being in operation until the issuance of the proclamation. After its issuance the board would have had jurisdiction only over transfer to foreign registry of vessels documented under our laws. During the year ended June 30, 1921, the board authorized the transfer of 401 vessels, of 202,283 gross tons, to foreign registry, but according to its practice it permitted the transfer of no vessel if such transfer would be detrimental to the interests of our merchant marine.

Seven companies to whom the board had sold vessels encountered receivership proceedings during the year under survey. A world-wide commercial depression had developed during the second half of the calendar year 1920. In fact, symptoms of its approach had been sensed in declining ocean freight rates during the first half of that year. These companies were unable to pay creditors, to make deferred purchase payments on ships. The board tried to help them by asking the courts to appoint receivers in equity instead of receivers in bankruptcy, by furnishing its own officials as such receivers, hoping to tide the companies over the period of general trade recession. The looked-for recovery did not materialize, the board's efforts were not successful, and the courts were requested to discharge the receivers.

The board did everything within its power during the commercially disastrous period that had set in to help all American shipping. Through the rate conferences in every trade in which its vessels plied it aided to prevent a decline of freight rates below cost of operation. In aligning and realigning cargo services and in restraining competition among the managing agents of its vessels it helped to sustain and stabilize rates for all shipping. It urged American companies, as a condition precedent of success, to establish American concerns in foreign countries to handle American vessels and solicit return cargoes.

A Shipping Board office was located in St. Louis to acquaint shippers with facilities offered by American vessels, whether board owned or privately owned, and to induce them to employ such facilities. The trade with Latin America declined in the general slump, but the board, with a view to preparation for the return of better times, made a careful study of services to Latin America so as to be able to persuade shippers to use all vessels flying our flag. A coastwise service was established between Paranagua, Brazil, and points on the River Plate, not only to meet the needs of local shippers but to serve as feeders for our ocean lines. On account of the business crisis, the board averaged but one sailing a month to the west coast of Africa during the year and but once every seven weeks to the south and east coasts.

During the year the board, seeing the need of more passenger services, established several additional ones. The ships placed in these lines were freshly constructed and splendidly equipped, were of two types, known, respectively, as the "502" type and the "535" type, the figures referring to the lengths of the vessels. Six vessels of the 502 type, each carrying 84 first-class passengers and having 465,940 cubic feet cargo space, with speed of 14 knots, were placed in the trade between New York and Queenstown, Boulogne, and London, and between San Francisco and Honolulu, Manila, Saigon, Singapore, Colombo, and Calcutta. Six vessels of the 535 type, each carrying 260 first-class passengers, 300 steerage passengers, and having 466,133 cubic feet cargo space, with a speed of 17½ knots, were placed in trade between Baltimore, San Francisco, and Honolulu; between San Francisco, Honolulu, Yokohama, Kobe, Shanghai, Manila, and Hongkong; and between Seattle, Kobe, Yokohama, Shanghai, and Manila.

The board established services, through the charter of ex-German passenger liners, between New York, Genoa, and Naples; New York, Bremen, and Danzig; between New York, Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen; between New York, Cuba, and Spain.

Besides, the board itself operated three ex-German passenger vessels in the trade between New York and the east coast of South America.

These passenger services enabled the board to carry a substantial portion of the United States mails, as contemplated by section 24 of the act of 1920, and to secure considerable revenue from that source.

During the year the board continued to create new trade routes, so that by June 30, 1921, it had established 410 general cargo berths—393 between the United States and foreign ports and 17 between foreign ports to serve as feeders.

During the year the board, through its port facilities commission, and the War Department, through the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, continued to cooperate under section 8 of the act of 1920 in making studies for the promotion, encouragement, and development of ports and transportation facilities in connection with water commerce.

During the year the board continued its policy of securing fuel-oil bunker stations at strategic locations on all trade routes, as a vital element in a successful merchant marine policy. Some of these it had to establish and operate through its own agencies, not being able to secure them through private companies. The tank steamers of the Shipping Board supplied these stations, otherwise the oil-burning fleet would have been at the mercy of foreign companies. This system resulted in oil at a lower cost than was possible in the open market. The object of the board was ultimately to supply all American vessels with fuel oil at the lowest possible price.

Inasmuch as only a small portion of the Shipping Board fleet was coal burning, the coal bunkering question was not so serious as that of oil. It was found advisable during the year, however, to establish bunker coal stations at certain ports.

Throughout the year the foreign organization of the board continued to function most effectively, facilitating the dispatch of vessels; securing modification or cancellation of irksome port regulations and restrictions; cooperating with operators' agents in handling marine disasters, surveys, and legal difficulties; determining the necessity for and supervising repairs; supervising purchase of supplies; supervising stevedoring; reporting on efficiency, attitude, and business affiliations of ship agents representing board operators; checking up vessel personnel; assisting representatives of operating companies in securing homeward and way cargoes; controlling homeward and way cargoes to prevent destructive competition between board operators; and reporting on all matters affecting the American merchant marine.

The marine-insurance arrangements resulting from the board's investigations were in effect throughout the year. Inasmuch as the subject of insurance was under State control, a model marine-insurance bill for the District of Columbia, developed by the joint action of the Shipping Board and the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, intended to serve as a suggestion to the States, was pending in Congress when the fiscal year closed.

In making sales of vessels under the act of 1920 the board, during the year ending June 30, 1921, placed a price on steel vessels ranging from $160 to $185 per dead-weight ton, less depreciation—10 per cent to be paid in cash, 5 per cent every six months thereafter for two years, balance to be paid in installments of 3½ per cent every six months for 10 years. On account of disastrous business conditions the demand for steel cargo vessels declined precipitately during the year. Thirty-seven tugs were sold for $2,170,500; 41 uncompleted wooden hulls for $2,063,542.67, an average price of $50,330.30. During the year ending June 30, 1921, purchasers of 121 steel vessels became unable, on account of critical business conditions, to make deferred payments, returned them to the board and the sales were canceled. These ships had a total dead-weight tonnage of 686,619 and a total net selling price of $87,885,273.25. There had been paid in cash on them $7,469,412.15, which was returned. Vessels still in the hands of purchasers on June 30, 1921, numbered 380, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 1,851,902, the net selling price being $293,907,429.54, cash payments, $159,482,747.08, balance represented by notes and accounts receivable, less certain allowances amounting to $13,116,555.28. It was due to no fault of the board or of the vessels that so many were being laid up and so many were being returned in a period of exceptional business depression.

The navigation and engineering schools of the board's recruiting service graduated 1,300 men during the fiscal year, and of these 1,190, or 91 per cent, got licenses, making the total number of graduates from the beginning 14,712, of whom 10,832 got licenses—about 74 per cent. The sea training bureau was discontinued on December 31, 1920, the supply of men beginning to equal demands as the slump in business conditions began to put ships out of commission. Schools training engineers on turbines furnished 289 students during the year, bringing the total since they began to 661. Twenty-six engineers of unusual ability and experience were trained on electric drive, and a few on internal combustion engines, Diesel type, but these specialized classes were stopped during the year on account of limited demand.

The sea-service bureau of the recruiting service placed on United States ships, public and private, during the year, 110,538 officers and men, of whom 68.8 per cent were Americans.

The division of regulations found the volume of its duties increasing during the year, the number of carriers' contracts examined and filed being about 300—the minutes of 2,230 steamship conference meetings and 2,637 conference tariffs being received, 7 formal docket hearings being held, 65 informal docket complaints being settled, 1,685 tariffs being filed, a number of special investigations and reports being made.

The board continued during the year the practice it had adopted from the beginning of circularizing all steamship and terminal companies in the United States to ascertain how many were subject to its jurisdiction in the matter of regulation. It developed that on June 30, 1921, the number of water carriers whose services had been discontinued was 200; of intrastate water carriers operating on rivers, lakes, and oceans, 138; of water carriers operating in interstate commerce on inland waters of the United States—river, lake, or canal (excluding the Great Lakes), 83; of operators of towage, lighterage, or ferriage service, 107; of water carriers engaged in interstate tramp service, 196; of water carriers engaged in foreign tramp service, 182; of water carriers subject to Interstate Commerce Commission, 28; of water carriers operating on regular routes in interstate commerce on the high seas or Great Lakes subject to the board's jurisdiction, 119; of water carriers operating on regular routes in foreign commerce of the United States subject to the board's jurisdiction, 241; of water carriers in exclusively proprietary service, 106; of forwarders and other persons subject to the board's jurisdiction, 32. Out of 1,200 steamship companies in business of their own ownership and management, 370 were subject to the board's regulatory jurisdiction, a gain of 76 during the year, not counting the forwarders and other persons subject to the board.

During the year the board's industrial relations division continued to supervise labor questions arising from operation of vessels and marine equipment, including work of loading and unloading, and endeavored to secure peaceable settlement of disputes, negotiation of working agreements, and promotion of harmony between employer and employee in marine industry. Things went generally well until late in the spring of 1921, the grievance committees doing as a rule effective work. At a general marine conference on April 27, 1921, the unions declined, so the board reports, to accept a wage reduction of 15 per cent, and a general marine strike was called on American ships, which lasted until June 14. At that time wage scales involving a 15 per cent reduction and certain changes in working conditions were promulgated by the board and accepted by the unions until January 1, 1922. In the case of longshore labor, old wages and working conditions were maintained in general throughout the year. A 10 per cent reduction on the average was made in shipyards and ship-repair yards, followed by a number of strikes, the most serious of which were in New Orleans and Philadelphia. Gradually the new conditions were accepted by the workers.

The board, being the largest owner and operator, realized that its labor policies affected and in a measure set the standard for all marine workers. It tried to deal with longshore and aboard-ship labor as a national whole, changes in one locality always reacting to a certain extent on others.

During the year the board appropriated $50,000 for advertising its shipping services, utilizing a group of advertising agencies, the actual cost, however, being $8,000, and being confined largely to a survey. Then followed a campaign through the advertising agencies in daily newspapers, costing $75,000, setting forth the board's freight and passenger services. A like effort in national magazines cost $20,000. The board through its own advertising department placed advertisements in newspapers, trade papers, and marine publications costing $66,000. Through its own advertising department it used the press in giving notice of disposal of surplus ships, shipyards, material, housing projects, of proposed purchases of bunker coal, fuel, lubricating oils, supplies, and so forth, at a total cost of $100,000. Through its advertising department the board supervised freight and passenger advertising of individual operators of board vessels, costing about $630,000, the cost being borne by them. Through this department the board devised motion-picture advertisements costing about $31,000.

On June 30, 1921, vessels owned by the Shipping Board numbered 1,792, of 11,323,668 dead-weight tons, an increase over June 30, 1920, of 218 vessels of nearly 2,000,000 tons. It will be remembered that the board was authorized by the act of 1920 to carry out all existing construction contracts and such construction plans already adopted as seemed advisable to the board to complete.

Of these 1,792 vessels owned by the board, 1,293 were steel cargo vessels, with a total tonnage of 8,800,000. Only 288 were wood and composite, with a total tonnage of 1,066,649.

Of these 1,293 steel cargo vessels, 60 were of 10,000 dead-weight tons each or over, 1 of these having a speed of 13.5 knots, 1 of 12.5, 2 of 12, 2 of 11.5, 15 of 11, 25 of 10.5, 6 of 10, 3 of 9.5, 3 of 9, 1 of 8, 1 of 7. Two hundred and seventy-seven were of 9,000 to 9,999 dead-weight tons each, 120 of these having a speed of 11.5 knots, 119 of 11, 21 of 10.5, 8 of 10, 3 of 9.5, 1 of 9, 4 of 8.5, 1 of 8. Three hundred and nine were of 8,000 to 8,999 dead-weight tons each, 3 of these having a speed of 12 knots, 20 of 11.5, 58 of 11, 150 of 10.5, 31 of 10, 9 of 9.5, 15 of 9, 8 of 8.5, 9 of 8, 4 of 7.5, 1 of 6.5, 1 of 6. One hundred and sixty-four were of 7,000 to 7,999 dead-weight tons each, 1 of these having a speed of 12 knots, 94 a speed of 11.5, 6 of 11, 43 of 10.5, 11 of 10, 1 of 9.5, 5 of 9, 2 of 8.5, 1 of 7. Twenty-four were of 6,000 to 6,999 dead-weight tons each, 1 of these having a speed of 12 knots, 8 of 10.5, 6 of 10, 4 of 9.5, 2 of 9, 1 of 8.5, 1 of 8, 1 of 6.5. One hundred and fifty were of 5,000 to 5,999 dead-weight tons each, 15 of these having a speed of 11 knots, 124 of 10.5, 5 of 10, 1 of 9.5, 2 of 9, 2 of 8.5, 1 of 7.5. Two hundred and twenty-seven were of 4,000 to 4,999 dead-weight tons each, 2 of these having a speed of 11.5 knots, 3 of 11, 2 of 10.5, 3 of 10, 173 of 9.5, 9 of 9, 11 of 8.5, 10 of 8, 8 of 7.5, 2 of 7, 2 of 6.5, 2 of 6. One hundred and fifty-five were of 3,000 to 3,999 dead-weight tons each, 3 of these having a speed of 12 knots, 3 of 10.5, 25 of 10, 70 of 9.5, 6 of 9, 17 of 8.5, 16 of 8, 10 of 7.5, 2 of 7, 2 of 6.5, 1 of 6. Twenty-seven were of 2,000 to 2,999 dead-weight tons each, 8 of these having a speed of 10 knots, 13 of 9.5, 2 of 9, 1 of 8.5, 2 of 8, 1 of 7.5.

To these steel cargo vessels add 16 steel refrigerator steamers of 118,106 dead-weight tons, 89 steel tank steamers of 828,881 dead-weight tons, 39 steel passenger steamers of 417,921 dead-weight tons, 3 steel colliers of 14,832 dead-weight tons, 2 steel cargo sailing vessels of 5,847 dead-weight tons—that is, 149 additional steel vessels with a dead-weight tonnage of 1,385,687—and we have 1,442 steel vessels owned by the Shipping Board on June 30, 1921, out of a total of 1,740, not counting 52 tugs, with a dead-weight tonnage of 10,185,687 out of a total of 11,323,668, excluding the tugs. (See fifth annual report Shipping Board.) We may accurately say, therefore, that on June 30, 1921, we had what was essentially and almost wholly a magnificent, modern, steel merchant fleet. Now, keep in mind the fact that only 12 of the 1,293 steel cargo vessels of this fleet had more than the speed required to secure the lowest subsidy in the pending bill, to wit, one-half of 1 cent per gross ton for each 100 nautical miles traveled, 11 of these 12 having speed enough to reach the second lowest subsidy rate, to wit, one-tenth of 1 cent in addition to the lowest, one having speed enough to reach third from lowest place; that is, two-tenths of 1 cent. There are 10 higher subsidy rates, growing toward the top, and to none of these would this stupendous steel fleet be eligible. Evidently the plot thickens.

During the fiscal year the board's vessels made a total of 5,130 sailings from European ports alone, the number beginning to shorten toward the close of the year.

Our total merchant marine on June 30, 1921, including Shipping Board boats and all others, numbered 3,723 seagoing vessels, with a gross tonnage of 13,234,401, an increase of 319 vessels of 1,955,660 gross tonnage.

The decline of freight rates continued on such a scale during the year that business became very difficult to secure all over the world, and many ships had to be laid up by other countries as well as ours.

The board announced in its fifth annual report, the report covering the year ending June 30, 1921, that the wood-ship construction program was completed on January 18, 1921, with the delivery of the harbor tug Rochelle to the Fleet Corporation. In that report the board explained why the wood ships were originally planned, stating that at the outset existing steel yards were all occupied with foreign contracts and that the construction of wood ships offered the next best way to meet the emergency demand for ships; that for this reason most of the corporation's earlier activities had been devoted to this class of construction; that the wood ships took a longer time to build than had been expected because of the scarcity of workmen skilled in and material adapted to the building of wood hulls; that at the armistice a large number of wood ships were in various degrees of completion, with many contracts not yet begun; that in every case all possible effort was made either to suspend construction or to finish the vessels as hulls or barges only, with the idea of disposing of them to as good advantage as practicable; that the original plan called for 1,017 wood vessels of different types; that 428 were finally canceled, leaving 589 to be wholly or partially completed as seemed best from the standpoint of successful disposition. As we have seen, the wood ships completed did good war emergency work and good service in certain types of ocean trade.

The program for the construction of concrete ships was ended on April 12, 1921, with the delivery of the steamship Moffitt. As concrete ships were still in the experimental stage, the decision to construct them was due solely to pressure of the war emergency. Originally they were to be cargo ships only, but later most of them were changed to tank steamers and the size increased from 3,500 to 7,500 tons. This program first called for 43 vessels of 302,000 dead-weight tons, but 31 of 228,500 tons were canceled, leaving on the active program 12 of 73,500 dead-weight tons.

The original program for composite ships—that is, ships whose wood hulls were strengthened with a certain amount of structural steel—called for 50, but, on account of high costs and long period required in building, 32 of 112,000 dead-weight tons were canceled, leaving on the active program 18 of 63,000 dead-weight tons, all of which were completed.

Construction of shipyard plants having ceased, the efforts of the yards and docks section of the board's construction department were devoted mainly during the year to construction of dry docks, marine railways, and repair plants, inspection of others in which the board was financially interested, and so forth. Nine of the seventeen dry docks contracted for were in operation during the year, seven were in process of construction, while one had been suspended. Six were under direct construction by the board. Of the 13 marine railways contracted for, 11 had been completed, while 2 had been suspended.

During the year a 15 per cent reduction in rates charged the board for ship repairs was secured, and on June 1, 1921, dry-docking charges in New York Harbor were reduced 66 per cent.

By November, 1920, the slump in shipping business became so serious that large numbers of vessels had to be laid up, a condition not peculiar to the United States. At the lowest ebb in the shipping situation during the fiscal year about 750 steel vessels were laid up of about 5,000,000 dead-weight tons. They were gathered in several lay-up areas, where the chief problem was that of care at the least expense to prevent deterioration. To this end the vessels were divided into three distinct groups, depending on condition at time of lay up and time required to put vessels in seaworthy condition, as follows: Class A including those requiring only minor voyage repairs sufficient to fit the vessel for service in three days or less, such ships being commonly called "spot ships"; class B including those requiring medium voyage repairs, such as would fit the vessel for service in 10 days or less; class C including those requiring a general or thorough overhauling, extensive repairs, reconditioning, new machinery installation, replacements, and so forth, covering 30 days or more.

When the vessels were turned back by managing agents general-condition surveys were made to determine in what repair class a vessel belonged, these surveys being known as "turn-back" and "lay-up" surveys.

The repair department of the board kept records of performance and condition data as to each vessel, both in service and lay up. Thus when a vessel was to be recalled to service the most efficient and suitable could be readily secured.

The repair department had a turbine section supervising repairs to turbines and improving this type of motive power. About 600 turbine vessels were in service on June 30, 1921. With turbine installations it was planned to secure for certain vessels which had been retired for lack of good equipment a first-class state of efficiency.

Two vessels equipped with the electric drive made successful maiden voyages during the year, and four others were being similarly equipped. The advantage of this type of motive power lay in maneuvering capacity, the saving in fuel, however, not proving as great as had been hoped for on one of these maiden trips.

The Diesel engine was being tried out in the ship William Penn as the year closed.

During the year more of the ex-German ships were placed in the passenger trade.

The Leviathan, the largest vessel afloat at that time except the Majestic, which was owned by the British White Star Line and was nearing completion in Germany, was out of action during the entire year ending June 30, 1921. Arrangement was made with the International Mercantile Marine Co. to care for the Leviathan while inactive and to act as the board's representative in reconditioning her, if that should be determined upon. When this ship was seized from Germany her plans were unavailable and the builders, Blohm & Voss, on being requested to name terms for them asked $1,000,000, a price considered prohibitive. The board then authorized the International Mercantile Marine Co. to prepare the plans. With nothing but the vessel itself to work from a set was prepared at much less cost than the price asked for the original papers. During her inactive status the vessel was kept in first-class condition, was painted and kept clean through and through. The machinery was also kept in first-class shape and the vessel was always ready to take the sea on short notice.

And so it was, as we have seen, with the other ships temporarily laid up on account of adverse commercial conditions. They were mainly first-class ocean carriers which had been laid up as a result of one of the severest, most prolonged, and most universal business depressions ever known, a depression reaching around the globe and holding all countries in its sinister grasp—carriers kept in excellent condition and ready to return to active sea work with the revival of commerce, a revival that has not yet developed.

Notwithstanding the number of vessels laid up the Shipping Board had 611 ships in our foreign trade on June 30, 1921, and during the year ending on that date American vessels carried nearly 40 per cent of our foreign trade tonnage in value and 52 per cent of its tonnage in quantity. In relative efficiency our ships exceeded their foreign competitors, the American percentage of load to dead-weight tonnage being 40.7 per cent, foreign 39. That is to say, American vessels carried each ton of cargo with 2.45 dead-weight tons, foreign with 2.57 dead-weight tons.

On June 30, 1921, the board's consolidated balance sheet showed assets of $3,070,599,518.40, the decrease since the preceding fiscal year being due mainly to shrinkage of values incident to the world-wide business decline, gratuities to other Government departments ordered by act of Congress, losses on uncompleted ships, cost of releases and reconveyances, and so forth—a remarkable showing in the face of a general economic collapse.

The Fleet Corporation's board of trustees consisted on June 30, 1921, of the recently appointed members of the Shipping Board. Mr. R. L. Hague resigned as director of construction and repairs on July 1, 1920, and was succeeded by Commander R. D. Gatewood, United States Navy.

We will now consider the history of the board during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922. Early in that year the board reorganized its methods of handling its regulatory duties, establishing five bureaus, to wit, traffic, operations, construction, law, and research. Each bureau was headed by a commissioner, except the traffic bureau, which on account of its importance was assigned to two commissioners, all bureaus being under the general supervision of the chairman.

The traffic bureau, headed by Commissioners Thompson and Plummer, had two lines of work, one relating to the growth and development of the privately owned and privately operated merchant marine, the other to regulation of shipping under the various acts conferring such authority. The first line of work had in view the assurance of cargo for water carriers and facilities for their proper operation. Carrying out this purpose the traffic bureau, under direction of section 7, merchant marine act of 1920, made a study of foreign and domestic markets in order to ascertain what steamship lines were needed in establishing and maintaining our foreign and coastwise trade, the best type and size of vessel required, and schedules essential to adequate, regular, and permanent service. It cooperated with the Postmaster General under sections 7 and 24 of the act of 1920 in arranging terms for carrying the mails on American vessels. Under section 8 of that act it made a study of plans for improvement and development of ports and transportation facilities in connection with water commerce, cooperated with the Secretary of War in investigating regions tributary to ports with reference to interior transportation facilities and the natural flow of commerce from interior points, investigated congestion at ports and remedies therefor, methods of securing for ports tonnage logically theirs and adequate shipping therefor, advised the board as to railroad rates and regulations detrimental to any port or to the merchant marine so that the board might take up the matter with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under section 19 of the act of 1920 the traffic bureau investigated during the fiscal year now under contemplation traffic conditions in foreign trade and recommended to the board steps necessary to meet any conditions unfavorable to American shipping. Under section 21 of the act of 1920 the bureau took up the matter of securing adequate steamship service between the United States and our island possessions so that they might be brought within our coastwise laws.

The bureau held hearings during the fiscal year to determine if service by American vessels at any American port was sufficiently adequate to justify application of section 28, heretofore described, but no final conclusion was reached. It also held hearings as to status and validity of contracts between railroad companies and foreign steamship lines giving preferential treatment to the prejudice of competing American lines, and many such contracts were voluntarily canceled by the roads. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, in the case of its contract with the Osaka Steamship Co., a Japanese line, however, and the Great Northern Railroad, in the case of its contract with the Nippon Yusen Kabushiki Kaisha, another Japanese line, did not agree to such remission, and the board entered an order requiring cancellation of these contracts by July 1, 1923. This bureau also made a study of the hearings held by the Interstate Commerce Commission, at the request of the Secretary of War and the Shipping Board, at various South Atlantic ports as to terminal charges on freight delivered by railroads to steamship companies, so as to bring about proper competition with privately owned and publicly owned terminals. The bureau also made a study of steps needed to protect United States ports and transcontinental railroads against competition of Canadian ports and railroads.

The second branch of this bureau's work comprised the regulatory duties imposed on the board by the acts of 1916 and 1920, having in view the protection of shipping companies in their competition with each other and the protection of shippers against unfair treatment by the companies. Conference agreements and contracts continued to be filed with the bureau throughout the fiscal year. Eleven formal docket complaints relating to rates, regulations, and practices of carriers were heard, as well as 74 informal complaints. Over 4,000 conference minutes and tariffs were filed, the latter showing a constant reduction in rates, fares, and charges, due to the general business disturbances and readjustments.

The bureau continued during the fiscal year now before us to ascertain for the board what carriers were subject to the board's jurisdiction. Reports received to June 30, 1922, showed the number of water carriers whose services had been discontinued to be 324; the number of intrastate water carriers on rivers, lakes, and oceans to be 156; of water carriers operating in interstate commerce on the inland waters of the United States, river, lake, or canal—excluding the Great Lakes—to be 87; operators of towage, lighterage, and ferriage service, 170; water carriers in interstate tramp service, 256; water carriers in foreign tramp service, 249; water carriers subject to jurisdiction of Interstate Commerce Commission, 29; water carriers operating on regular routes in interstate commerce on high seas or Great Lakes subject to the jurisdiction of the Shipping Board, 133; water carriers operating on regular routes in foreign commerce of the United States subject to the board, 278; water carriers engaged exclusively in proprietary service, 166; forwarders and other persons subject to board's jurisdiction, 116. The classes subject to the board's jurisdiction number 527 carriers, forwarders, and so forth, an increase over the preceding fiscal year of 135. This is an excellent tribute to the effectiveness of the acts of 1916 and 1920 in building up a permanent and growing merchant marine without a subsidy.

The bureau of operation, headed by Commissioner T. V. O'Connor, comprised the following divisions: Industrial relations, sea-service bureau, stevedoring committee, docks and wharves.

The industrial relations division gave special attention throughout the year to questions involved in labor administration, realizing the fact that labor was the most important factor in successful ship operation. At the close of the year—that is, on June 30, 1922—about 50,000 men were working on the vessels of the American merchant marine, and more than 50,000 were working on land as longshoremen in loading and unloading vessels. This division in the effort to promote better relations between employer and employee made a study of questions involving wages, hours of labor, employment conditions, privileges, rights, and duties of employer and employee; collected and compiled data on labor rates and conditions, and investigated grievances. The board stated in its sixth annual report that its policy in dealing with employees had been to recognize the principle of collective bargaining wherever possible. On August 1, 1921, the wage agreement with deck officers ended and a new arrangement was made, carrying a 15 per cent wage reduction, a similar reduction having been made for the engineers. The wage agreement with the seamen and other vessel workers having expired on January 1, 1922, a new arrangement was made for a reduction of 15 to 25 per cent in wages to July 1, 1922, a reduction which on that date was continued another six months. As to wages of longshoremen, the custom had been for many years to fix them through collective bargaining for stated periods. Negotiations in the fall of 1921 resulted in reductions of 18 to 25 per cent, a number of strikes following at various points. The board claimed in its sixth annual report, covering the fiscal year now being considered, that these wage reductions had netted a saving in connection with Shipping Board vessels of over $10,000,000. I am not expressing any opinion as to the merit of these reductions; I am merely giving the facts as they appear in the board's official report.

Although the navigation and engineering schools continued to do fine work, increasing efficiency of officers and causing more economical operation of vessels, they were terminated in September and December, 1921, respectively, on account of the urgent demand for reduction of all Government expenditures. The navigation school graduated 196 men during the part of the fiscal year it was in operation, the engineering school 296. On August 5, 1921, the turbine training courses were closed, 67 graduates having been turned out between the end of the previous fiscal year and that date.

The sea-service bureau was retained, and during the year ending June 30, 1922, placed 84,782 officers and men on United States ships, 92 per cent of these officers and men being Americans, being an increase of 23 per cent in this respect over the preceding fiscal year.

The bureau of operation worked out during the year a revision of stevedoring rates and methods and a checking system to secure compliance with established rate schedules. This was done through the bureau's stevedoring committee. Through its division of docks and wharves several units were added to the terminal facilities controlled by the board during the year.

The bureau of construction under the new board, headed by Admiral Benson, was created in November, 1921, and during the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, investigated under direction of section 12, shipping act of 1916, relative cost of building merchant vessels in the United States and foreign maritime countries, rules of construction at home and abroad, and methods of classification and rating. This bureau also had jurisdiction over transfer of American vessels to foreign registry, and during the fiscal year we are now studying permitted such transfer for 158 vessels of 121,931.55 gross tons. Seven undocumented barges, one undocumented towboat, and one undocumented dredge were transferred, permission for undocumented vessels no longer being necessary since presidential proclamation ending emergency had issued. As stated before, the board would not permit transfer of any vessel over which it had jurisdiction if transfer in any way militated against the welfare of the American merchant marine.

This bureau also administered the construction loan fund authorized by section 11 of the merchant marine act of 1920.

This bureau also passed on applications for approval of type and kind of vessel permitted to be built with funds accruing under section 23, act of 1920, through remission of certain taxes in favor of new vessel construction, inspected such vessels on completion, and checked their compliance with the requirements. A list of vessels proposed to be constructed under this section was given in the review of the preceding fiscal year.

This bureau also supervised the classification of vessels and did what it could to advance the standing of the American bureau of shipping, which had been recognized by section 25, act of 1920, as the official classification agency. The purpose was to secure classification for American vessels independently of all foreign institutions, such as Lloyds.

This bureau was charged with the study of new designs of hull and machinery in order to determine the best modes of propulsive power, especially those based on internal-combustion engines.

This bureau was given the supervision of the reconditioning of the Leviathan, and had the reconditioning in progress when the fiscal year ended, the estimated cost being $7,000,000. It was expected that this ship would be ready for European tourist traffic in 1923.

The bureau of law, headed by the distinguished and able former Senator George E. Chamberlain, was instituted in November, 1921, and immediately began a thorough investigation of discrimination by foreign governments, officials, merchants, or companies against American vessels in foreign trade, the investigation having been directed by section 26, shipping act of 1916, and other legislation, the investigation covering statutes of foreign countries, rules and regulations of ports and customs districts of other nations, treaties and reciprocity acts, inquiry into actual cases of unfair competition with and discrimination against American vessels by foreign merchants or steamship companies in the matter of terminal facilities, traffic privileges, interpretation of local rules and regulations, and commercial and shipping activities in which our vessels were legitimately involved.

This bureau also supervised the continuance of the work of examining and codifying the navigation laws throughout the fiscal year. It also had the duty of devising regulations for the administration of section 23, act of 1920, which waived certain taxes in the event of certain earnings being devoted to new ships. This it performed in cooperation with the Treasury Department, the rules being promulgated on June 13, 1922.

This bureau also held hearings for the board on the subject of unfair trade practices prohibited by section 19, act of 1916. It also performed certain functions vested in the board in connection with the ship-mortgage sections of the act of 1920. It also had charge of the study and application of certain laws regulating the relations of the board with private vessels.

The bureau of research, headed by Commissioner Meyer Lissner, had already been in existence and was continued and enlarged by the new board. It made during the fiscal year special studies on which proposed shipping legislation was based, collected statistics as to cargo movements in American and foreign vessels, analyzing them by trade divisions, by American ports, and by classes of commodities. It conducted extensive investigations of the general subject of marine insurance. It cooperated with the War Department in making a study of ports, port facilities, and transportation in the regions tributary to the various ports for the purpose of devising and suggesting methods for relief of congestion and improvement in flow of commerce. It kept in touch with marine happenings throughout the world in order to have information available as to commerce and shipping in the United States or in foreign nations.

On July 11, 1921, the board of trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, who were also members of the Shipping Board, in order to relieve themselves from the numerous duties connected with the affairs of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, elected J. B. Small vice president in charge of chartering and allocation of vessels, A. J. Frey vice president in charge of physical operation of vessels, W. J. Love vice president in charge of traffic matters, Elmer Schlesinger vice president in charge of legal matters, and on September 23, 1921, elected H. S. Kimball vice president in charge of finance, and on September 30, 1921, elected E. P. Farley vice president in charge of sales.

On September 30, 1921, the Shipping Board passed a resolution to the effect that whereas the merchant marine act of 1920 had provided that the power and authority thereby vested in the board might be exercised directly or indirectly by the board, or by it through the Emergency Fleet Corporation, except as therein otherwise specifically provided; and that whereas in the board's opinion the executive and personnel organization of the Fleet Corporation had reached such a standard of efficiency as to make it desirable that the board should exercise through the corporation various administrative powers and functions, thereby making it possible for the board to devote its attention to the study and determination of the broad and constructive questions of policy relating to the maintenance, development, and encouragement of the American merchant marine under powers and duties imposed on it by law, it was resolved that it was the sense of the board that its chairman should retire as president, its members as trustees of the corporation, and that there should be elected a separate president and separate board of trustees for said corporation, and that the power and authority vested in the board by the act of 1920 should until otherwise ordered by the board be exercised by it through the Fleet Corporation in the following matters:

1. Operation, maintenance, repair, and reconditioning of vessels, provided that no established line should be discontinued or new line established or allocation of passenger vessels made without the board's approval.
2. Completion of construction work on vessels heretofore begun or authorized by board.
3. Sale of vessels (except to aliens) at such prices and on such terms and conditions as board might prescribe.
4. Operation and sale of housing projects, real estate, railroad, and other similar property subject to board's confirmation before any final contract of sale is made.
5. Operation and sale of dry docks, all sales being subject to board's terms and prices.
6. Custody and sale of all other property and materials.
7. All accounting for corporation.
8. Insurance and matters pertaining thereto.

9. Operation of piers and pier facilities, no pier to be leased without prior authority from board.

10. Leasing and rental of offices, warehouses, docks, and storage facilities.

11. All matters incidental to foregoing, such as execution of contracts, charters, bills of sale, leases, deeds, and so forth.

The resolution further provided that an accurate record should be kept of the meetings of the corporation, a summary transmitted to the chairman and each commissioner of the board, and notices of the meetings of trustees of the corporation sent to each member of the board; that the control of the corporation should remain with the board; and that the president and each member of the board of trustees of the corporation should deposit with the secretary of the board their resignations for acceptance at the board's pleasure, and to deliver to the secretary of the board their qualifying shares of stock in the corporation indorsed in blank for transfer.

In accordance with this resolution, the chairman of the board retired as president of the corporation, the other members of the board retired as trustees of the corporation, and the following trustees of the corporation were elected: J. W. Powell, J. B. Smull, W. J. Love, A. J. Frey, Elmer Schlesinger, H. S. Kimball, and E. P. Farley. J. W. Powell was made president of the corporation and the following assignment of duties made to the other trustees: J. B. Smull, vice president, in charge of allocation department, contract department, and chartering department; W. J. Love, vice president, in charge of traffic department, advertising department, and marine-insurance department; A. J. Frey, vice president, in charge of operating department, department of maintenance and repair, fuel department, department of purchases and supplies, statistical department, and field office, American and foreign; H. S. Kimball, vice president, in charge of general comptroller's department, treasurer's and disbursing department, insurance department (other than marine), and collection department; Elmer Schlesinger, vice president, in charge of legal department, claims department, and department of investigation; E. P. Farley, vice president, in charge of surplus property department and department of ship sales.

President J. W. Powell resigned on March 4, 1922, and Vice President A. J. Frey died on June 13, 1922. These vacancies had not been filled when the fiscal year closed, and in the interim Mr. Smull, senior vice president, became acting president.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, the world-wide business depression grew more acute, export and import business and ocean freight rates continued to decline, great losses were incurred, and it became necessary to make still further reductions in the board's vessels on the seas. The number of these vessels was reduced from 744 on June 30, 1921, to 394 on June 30, 1922. Of the vessels in ocean trade at the beginning of the fiscal year, about 300 were in the so-called tramp service and the remainder in the regular line service. The tramp steamers became so unprofitable that they were all withdrawn and laid up. It will be seen, therefore, that of the vessels in regular line service on June 30, 1921, only a few were taken out and laid up during the succeeding fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Texas would be glad to stop now, and that will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am sure that I can conclude in a reasonably brief time to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

[At this point Mr. SHEPPARD yielded the floor for the day.]

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its proceedings to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator think we will gain anything by that? I rather think that we ought to adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I believe it would be better to take a recess. We had an opportunity for morning business this morning and also considered bills on the calendar, and I should like to recess until to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 4, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 3, 1923.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Marcus B. Campbell to be United States district judge, eastern district of New York.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

John S. Coke to be United States attorney, district of Oregon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord and Master, come as Thou wilt and prepare us to receive Thee with eagerness of heart. As our lives are made up of ordinary yet vital duties, establish us in all patience and well-doing. Give us strength and wisdom that we may at all times control those elements and influences which may cause personal vexations and hardship. Bless our Nation and the nations of the earth and work out among them the sovereign purpose of Thy holy will. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 30, 1922, was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to the fact that on December 29 there were certain references put in the RECORD purporting to be the views of Mr. Hoover in regard to the tariff. Mr. Hoover has called my attention to these references which erroneously state his views, and in justice to the Secretary of Commerce and his views on this important subject I ask unanimous consent that I may include in my remarks a statement from Mr. Hoover.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, who put them in the RECORD?

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman ought to wait until the gentleman from Arkansas is here to give him an opportunity to correct them if they are erroneous.

Mr. HICKS. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request and will make it when Mr. WINGO is on the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the Agricultural appropriation bill and moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Jones amendment relating to the publication of the special report on Diseases of the Horse and Diseases of Cattle.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote on any other amendment.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Jones amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 70, line 24, after the figures "$39,000," insert a new paragraph as follows:

"For printing, binding, and distribution of the publications entitled 'Diseases of the Horse' and 'Diseases of Cattle,' $200,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 36 ayes and 50 noes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 119, not voting 163, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and Mr. CARTER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit which I send to the desk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Oklahoma opposed to the bill?

Mr. CARTER. I certainly am, without this amendment in it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is on the committee, and the Chair recognizes him. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CARTER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: "Page 32, after line 16, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $360,000. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated; and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit on the ground that the amendment is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and it is a change of existing law. Especially I call the attention of the Chair to that part of the amendment embraced in the motion to recommit which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make seed contracts for a period as long as five years, extending the contracts through the life of more than two Congresses. It is unauthorized, and it should not be permitted on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma claim that it is authorized by existing law?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I know the present occupant of the chair is familiar with the various actions that have been taken with reference to this matter, but I call the attention of the Chair to the two very important ones. As the Chair is aware, perhaps, on January 29, 1907, Mr. Candler, of Mississippi, offered a similar amendment. Mr. Jones, of Washington, made a point of order against it. The Chair sustained the point of order, and on an appeal from that decision the decision of the Chair was overruled by a vote of 136 to 84.

The SPEAKER. Was that in the House or in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CARTER. That was in Committee of the Whole. Then, last year, on March 29, 1922, the Chairman refused to rule on the point, but submitted it to the House.

The SPEAKER. Was that in the committee or in the House?

Mr. CARTER. That was in the committee. At that time the committee again sustained the amendment by a vote of 113 to 46. The committee having twice decided on the matter, that, it seems to me, ought to fix the status of it. On two different occasions the House in Committee of the Whole has decided by decisive and overwhelming majorities that this same amendment was not obnoxious to the rules of the House. Therefore it is simply now a question of the House having the right to fix the parliamentary precedents. It is a question of the House having the right to vote on that on which it desires to vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman claim that in his opinion this is not a change of existing law?

Mr. CARTER. I claim that the House in the Committee of the Whole has twice decided that it was not, and that is a much better precedent than the opinion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BEGG. Did the House decide this or the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CARTER. The House in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BEGG. That is an entirely different proposition from the House.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Committee of the Whole the other day reversed the decision.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me a moment? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is in error when he says that the committee reversed it the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas had not been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. LANGLEY. I misunderstood the situation. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House has three times decided that this amendment is in order; and not only that, but, as stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], the Committee of the Whole House by a decisive vote has also twice decided it is in order. As the Chair knows, it is practically the same thing as the House acting, because, as everybody knows, it is merely a fiction that we go from the House into the Committee of the Whole and back again into the House. So that the membership of the House has, as a matter of fact, decided more than once that it is in order, and therefore not a change of existing law. What is the use of going over it all again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware, as all the membership of the House is probably aware, that this question has come up many times in Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks that every Chairman of the Committee of the Whole who has given his opinion upon it as a problem of parliamentary law has ruled that it is not in order. The Chair thinks that every Member of the House who will give the matter his unbiased attention will admit that it is not in order. It seems to the Chair perfectly clear, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr.

CARTER] does not argue that it is in order under the rules of parliamentary law, but merely argues that the Committee of the Whole has several times decided by a majority vote that it is in order. He offers no other argument as to its being in order. The Chair thinks probably he is wise in that, because the Chair does not see how such an argument can be sustained.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to rule. The Chair has heard the gentleman. The Chair thinks he ought to suggest that preserving the authority and binding force of parliamentary law is as much the duty of each Member of the House as it is the duty of the Chair, that the rights of every one of us here depend upon it, and that each Member ought to vote on such a question, not as his interest or desires in respect to the particular subject may sway him but as he thinks is really the law. It is unquestionably true that several times the Committee of the Whole House has overruled the decision of the Chairman of that committee and has held that an amendment like this is in order. That, however, has never been done in the House. If the House should take that action, of course the Chair would bow to the opinion of the House and follow it; but until then the Chair thinks that he is bound to follow the rules of parliamentary law, and the Chair thinks the same duty rests upon every individual Member of the House. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, much as I respect the Speaker's judgment and fairness, I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from Minnesota moves to lay the appeal on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced himself in doubt.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 173, nays 85, answered "present" 3, not voting 169, as follows:

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, if I am recorded "aye" I ask leave to withdraw that vote as I find I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The name of Mr. GREENE of Vermont was called and he answered "present."

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I think not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia does not qualify. He must be present when his name is called.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill which was just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1923.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the Governor of Pennsylvania my resignation as a Representative in the Sixty-seventh Congress of the United States from the first congressional district of Pennsylvania, the term of which ends March 4, 1923, the said resignation to take effect January 2, 1923.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM S. VARE.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill making appropriations for the Interior Department, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Raker amendment, page 36 of the bill, to rebuild the Greenville (Calif.) Indian School, and also on the Temple amendment, on page 87, increasing from $325,000 to $500,000 the appropriation for the topographical survey.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 36, between lines 4 and 5, add as a new paragraph the following:

"For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville School, California, including pay for superintendent, $24,000; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; for repair of school building on account of and by reason of the fire of December 17, 1921, to be immediately available, $60,000; in all, $88,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 37, noes 127.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and two Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 51, nays 202, not voting 176, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Rose with Mr. Mead.

Mr. A. P. Nelson with Mr. Woods of Virginia.

Mr. Arentz with Mr. Aswell.

Mr. Snell with Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Sinnott with Mr. Ward of North Carolina.

Mr. Kendall with Mr. Hudspeth.

Mr. Luce with Mr. McSwain.

Mr. Porter with Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Purnell with Mr. Tyson.

Mr. Christopherson with Mr. Lee of Georgia.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TEMPLE: Page 87, line 8, after the word "forests," strike out "$324,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TEMPLE. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 60.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, what was the vote? I did not hear the announcement.

The SPEAKER. The ayes are 61 and noes are 60.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAMTON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to a roll call being held that way, but I will call attention to the last roll call, which showed a quorum, and no business has been transacted since then.

The SPEAKER. It is very clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that after the Chair had announced the vote on the division the gentleman called for the yeas and nays, and the Speaker was proceeding to count, and then the point of no quorum was made. I make the point of order that the point comes too late.

Mr. WINGO. The matter still was not closed.

Mr. BLANTON. But it would bring the vote on the call for yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would bring the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. The point of no quorum is in order at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as favor the amendment will, as their names are called, vote yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 113, answered "present" 1, not voting 177, as follows:

YEAS—138.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Williams of Illinois with Mr. Rucker.

Mr. Porter with Mr. Tague.

Mr. Langley with Mr. Ward of North Carolina.

Mr. Hukriede with Mr. Logan.

Mr. Dowell with Mr. Sabath.

Mr. Bixler with Mr. Carew.

Mr. Bland of Indiana with Mr. Gilbert.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The amendment is agreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRAMTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th day of December, 1922, I took occasion to comment rather facetiously upon an article in the well-recognized administration paper, the Washington Post. At that time I called attention to that article, and referred not only to the newspaper but to the writer of the article, Mr. Harry N. Price, and called attention to the title of the article, which was "Tariff seen as a boon." In reading that article, which appeared on the front page of the administration organ that day, I read a quotation which Mr. Price made from Mr. Hoover. Evidently Mr. Hoover did not himself read my remarks, but anyway he has written me a letter saying he did not make the statement attributed to him and asking me to correct any misimpressions that may have been given to an expectant country by a misstatement of his position upon the question covered in the article.

So that the House may appreciate the spirit of my remarks upon that occasion, those of you who were here will recall that it was a facetious statement, and that in making it I had but one object in view, and that was to call attention to that which was obvious, and that Mr. Price had been directed by the administration to go out and adopt the Doctor Coué method of satisfying the American people with the recently enacted profiteer tariff bill. That was the object of my remarks, which you will find on page 1074 of the RECORD of December 29. You also remember I expressed great surprise to find that one of the arguments the writer gave why this tariff was proving such a boon was that "the imports and the exports are becoming more evenly balanced, and that this is the result of foreign countries paying more in goods than in money, which is helping to bring about a stabilization of foreign exchange and a balance of the world's gold supply."

I expressed surprise on that occasion that a Republican should make any such statement. Later on I read from my own remarks, on page 1075, as follows:

> But, of course, any dissertation at this time would be a little bit "off" if it did not include the guiding genius of this administration—the good genius of this administration and the evil genius of the Wilson administration—Sir Herbert Hoover.

And then the article in question stated the following:

> Mr. Hoover reported, it is said, that arguments that the high duties of the new tariff would strangle imports, so as to make it impossible for foreign countries to buy from America, were controverted effectively by the facts. He held that the invisible exchange more than anything else made up the difference, and that prosperity at home, helped by a protective but a proper tariff, brings a reflex action in foreign trade.

Of course, I paused after reading that quotation from Mr. Price the other day, and then I said: "Get that, my friends, and do not forget it, because Sir Herbert said it, and it must be true."

That is the only statement that can be attributed to me as a quotation of Mr. Hoover. He now writes me:

> My attention has been called to a statement of yours in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 29 relative to a statement you attribute to me with regard to the effect of tariff on foreign trade and upon gold movements. You have apparently been quoting some one else, or some one's mistaken deductions.

If Mr. Hoover had taken the pains to read my remarks he would have seen that I did not attribute any statement to him, but that I simply read from a newspaper article by Harry N. Price in the Washington Post of December 27, I at the time specifically so stating, so, if anyone has attributed to him a statement that he did not make, it is Mr. Price from whose article I read. I am not interested in the controversy that thus arises between Mr. Hoover and Mr. Price, but I desire to be fair to Mr. Hoover, and for that reason I intend to put his side of the controversy in the RECORD just as I put in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Price. Turning again to the letter of Mr. Hoover to me I read, as follows:

> I wish to state emphatically that I have never made any such statement as you attribute to me. I inclose herewith the only statement I have made on the subject and I would be obliged if you would correct the misimpressions you have given in the RECORD.

I wish to analyze the statement of Mr. Price's which I quoted and which Mr. Hoover now denies, and compare Mr. Price's quotation of him with extracts from the statement which Mr. Hoover says is the only statement he has made. There are three substantive statements contained in the quotation of Mr. Hoover in the newspaper article written by Mr. Price. The first I read is as follows:

> Mr. Hoover said that arguments that the high duties of the new tariff would strangle imports so as to make it impossible for foreign countries to buy from America were controverted effectually by the facts.

Now, let us see if Mr. Price by that statement correctly quoted Mr. Hoover. So that you may judge I will now read an extract from the statement that Mr. Hoover sent me and which he says is the only statement he has made. I quote Mr. Hoover's statement:

> The theoretical assumption that the new tariff will so diminish our imports as to strangle the buying power of foreign countries for our exports does not seem borne out by a critical examination of the actual factors involved.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I may be mistaken, but that is in substance exactly what Harry Price said in the article that I read to the House the other day; but now Mr. Hoover writes me:

> I have never made any such statement.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is any difference in substance and only a difference in phraseology, I confess I can not discover it.

What is the next substantive statement attributed to Mr. Hoover quoted by me from the Price article? Turning again to the statement in the RECORD I read:

> That he held that the invisible exchange more than anything else made up the difference and that prosperity at home, helped by a protective but proper tariff brings a reflex action in foreign trade.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Price thus attributed to Mr. Hoover a statement which he did not make. Again referring to the statement which Mr. Hoover sent me, I find on the first page of it there is a subhead entitled "Invisible exchange," and the first line under that subhead is as follows:

> The influence of the balance of invisible exchange in our whole trade and financial relationships is of growing importance.

Further along in the same statement which Mr. Hoover sent me on the third page of that statement I find the following language:

> It would at least appear that the invisible exchange is certainly able to take care of commodity balances.

Why, Mr. Speaker, are not these two extracts from the statement which Mr. Hoover himself admits he made, the basis of, and really the substance of the statement that Mr. Price attributed to him in his article of which now Mr. Hoover complains and says:

> I deny emphatically that I made any such statement.

Now, what is the next substantive statement attributed to Mr. Hoover by Mr. Price in his article which I read to the House the other day? It is as follows:

> That prosperity at home helped by a protective but proper tariff brings a reflex action in foreign trade.

But Mr. Hoover, taking exception to the quotation that I made from Price's article, says:

> I did not make any such statement.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I confess I can not understand why a Republican should grow indignant and enter a denial to such a statement, because it is one of the stock arguments of the Republicans, and, as a matter of fact, the whole trend of Mr. Hoover's admitted statement is epitomized by this statement which Mr. Price attributes to him. But, Mr. Speaker, my surprise at Mr. Hoover's denial in view of the facts is only equaled by the surprise I expressed the other day at Mr. Price's article seeking to show that the tariff was a boon to this country because it increased imports of foreign goods into the domestic markets.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, this controversy but illustrates the contention I made when I discussed the article by Mr. Price. When you start out by sophistry to defend an unsound proposition, whether it be one of legislation or of economics, you get yourself into trouble and meet yourself coming back, as does both Price and Hoover. All over this country the newspapers are carrying headings to the effect that Hoover says so and so. It is but the propaganda of the Republican organization in its efforts to try to meet by Doctor Coué methods the objections of bona fide protectionists—not Democrats, but those who believe in a protection theory—to the profiteer tariff law. If Mr. Hoover is so very jealous of his reputation and will endeavor to follow every one of these things up, I fear that he will find his hands full. On my desk I noted to-day 19 newspapers of the South and West that are carrying this particular propoganda, and I think he should not complain, unless he goes to the newspaper editors or, better still, step right around the corner to the head of the Republican propaganda bureau which is sending out this "bunk." He has no right to complain if I, as a Democrat, an innocent bystander on the side lines, now and then indulge in the amusing pastime of analyzing the incongruities of their arguments and statements made in defense of that monstrosity, the profiteers' tariff act recently enacted. The Democrats certainly are allowed that privilege; but, Mr. Speaker, in justice to Mr. Hoover, I ask unanimous consent to set out in extenso the statement which he inclosed in his letter to me and which he says is the statement he really issued.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand that the gentleman is going to put into the RECORD the three or four pages making up Mr. Hoover's statement? The gentleman from Arkansas and I talked about this matter this morning.

Mr. WINGO. I have read in its entirety, though in separated paragraphs, Mr. Hoover's letter to me, and also parts of his statement; but I desire to put into the RECORD the complete statement that he attached to his letter to me, and from which I have been quoting.

Mr. HICKS. The three or four printed pages?

Mr. WINGO. There are 1, 2, 3, 4, 5—winding up with the statement headed "Currents in Foreign Trade."

Mr. HICKS. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

During the 12 months ending June 30, 1922, our foreign trade suffered in common with the general world depression. The monetary value of our exports and imports during the period in question, in comparison with the previous fiscal year, is shown in the following table:

	1920-21	1921-22
Imports	$3,654,459,346	$2,608,079,008
Exports	6,516,510,033	3,771,286,428
Total foreign trade	10,170,969,379	6,379,365,436
Balance of exports over imports	2,862,050,687	1,163,207,420

The fall in the monetary value of imports was therefore 28.6 per cent, in exports 42.1 per cent, and in total trade 37.3 per cent. The great decline in value from the previous year was due in a large degree to a fall in prices rather than in quantities, as indicated by the tables of quantity movements of larger commodities in this statement. From these tables it will be seen that our agricultural exports were actually larger in quantity during the year of depression, although they decreased in value by about $700,000,000. A study of the whole export and import list so far as quantitative statistics are available indicates that roughly our trade in 1922, if it was valued at 1921 prices, would have shown a decrease in exports of 12 per cent, an increase in imports of 29 per cent, or an increase in total trade of roughly 2.7 per cent.

INVISIBLE EXCHANGE.

It is possible to estimate roughly some elements in invisible exchange, such as public issues of foreign loans, tourist traffic, remittances of immigrants, and freight; but other items such as private loans, reciprocal interest payments, investments, and loss by speculation in foreign currencies are unknowable factors. Foreign loans were issued publicly during the fiscal year to the amount of $1,015,000,000 as compared with $618,000,000 during the previous year. What the ebb and flow of private loans may have been is, of course, unknown. It would appear that the net balance of the other items against us amounted to a minimum of from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 per annum. In any event, the invisible exchange against us could be approximated at not less than about $1,000,000,000 or $1,100,000,000 in 1920–21 and about $1,400,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 in 1921–22.

The balance of goods in our favor drew a net amount of $449,000,000 in gold and silver during the fiscal year 1922, as compared with $511,000,000 during the previous year.

For the year 1920–21 the excess of export goods over imports, i. e., the total trade balance of $2,862,000,000 was liquidated in part by $511,000,000 in precious metals shipped to us in part by invisible exchange of, say, $1,100,000,000, leaving an apparently unliquidated balance of about $1,200,000,000 to $1,300,000,000 for that fiscal year. A study of the banking returns of unfunded foreign advances at this time does not bear out the conclusion that such an amount of private financing of exports, as indicated above, was ever undertaken and thus the probabilities are that the speculative losses in European currencies and other investments and other forms of invisible exchange were even larger than has been estimated above.

For the year 1921–22 the excess of exports over imports of $1,163,000,000 was liquidated in part by $449,000,000 net imports of precious metals and this, together with the additional estimated balance against us of $1,500,000,000 of invisible exchange, exceeds the amount necessary to square accounts by some $750,000,000. No doubt this was at least partly absorbed in repayment of private loans because even a smaller amount of private export financing existed in July, 1922, than in July, 1921. Generally this change indicates a much sounder and firmer basis of trade.

GOLD MOVEMENT.

The gold situation in the world is a matter of a great deal of economic thought, and no doubt the heavy drain to America has contributed to the instability of foreign currencies, not only by the diminution of their essential guaranties but also by their fluctuation involved in liquidating trade balances in this fashion. Our gold stocks amount to about $3,077,000,000. Of this the minimum legal necessities at the moment for assurances to our currency and credits amount roughly to about $1,600,000,000, but for a 60 per cent reserve of security we would require about $2,400,000,000. Therefore our surplus amounts to somewhere over $700,000,000. While this is an asset it nevertheless would be more advantageous to us if it were in active use. The automatic tendencies in our international trade and financial relations are, however, setting strongly toward rectification of this whole situation without artificial action.

There is a steady increase in the ratio of imports to exports of goods as indicated by the decrease in the average monthly balances in our favor over the last two and one-fourth years.

Average monthly balance in our favor.

Six months, July 1 to December 30, 1920	$274,674,811
Six months, January 1 to July 1, 1921	202,333,636
Six months, July 1 to December 30, 1921	126,980,328
Six months, December 30 to July 1, 1922	66,887,576
Three months, July 1 to October 1, 1922	51,623,542

At this rate we would, theoretically, reach a balance in the movement of goods in another few months. However, economic movements do not proceed on time schedules, although their trends are no less positive. Many uncertain factors naturally affect commodity movements, and but little beyond tendencies can be noted. It would at least appear that the invisible exchange is certainly able to take care of commodity balances, and that we are reaching the end of the gold import stage of war readjustments. Continued trend in the general direction now evident would soon produce gold exports even in the face of payments on account of allied debts.

SHIFT IN THE CHARACTER OF EXPORTS.

There are several important shifts in our foreign trade due to the war. The export of foodstuffs has immensely increased, due partially to the demoralization of Russia. There is at best no probability of Russian exports of large volume for another two or three years, not only because of the condition of agriculture but also because of the demoralization of her railways. There has been a decrease in raw cotton exports due to various causes, chiefly short production, but partly due to steady increase in our cotton manufactures.

The following table shows the quantitative movement of major agricultural exports, pre-war, and for the last two fiscal years:

	1913	1921	1922
Grain and grain products....bushels..	258,343,629	543,375,523	544,220,964
Meats, dairy products, animal and vegetable fats.....pounds..	1,610,053,715	2,384,517,262	2,192,174,236
Tobacco, leaf.....do....	418,796,906	496,878,830	451,555,221
Fruits.....do....	620,423,027	675,892,388	491,227,149
Total values	$453,165,897	$1,572,636,646	$938,223,155
Total values at 1913 prices	$453,165,897	$775,052,757	$742,355,278
Cotton, raw.....bales..	8,724,572	5,408,986	6,541,841
Oil cake and meal .....pounds..	2,049,361,136	857,606,407	1,099,246,797
Total values	$576,801,447	$619,698,455	$619,149,842
Total values at 1913 prices	$576,801,447	$351,629,525	$426,165,862

About 55 per cent of our total exports are agricultural produce and raw materials, and 45 per cent are manufactured and partly manufactured goods (excluding manufactured foodstuffs).

About 75 per cent of our exports of agricultural produce and raw materials go to Europe and about 25 per cent to the rest of the world.

About 26 per cent of our manufactured goods go to Europe and 74 per cent elsewhere.

Our exports of agricultural produce comprise, roughly, 15 per cent of the entire crop value on the farm, while our exports of manufactured goods comprise less than 4 per cent of our production. Our exports of agricultural produce to Europe comprise 11 per cent of the value of our agricultural production and less than 1 per cent of our manufactured production.

This last fact has much to do with our ability to shake loose from European economic currents in the manufacturing industries, and with the strengthening of employment in our home industries we will, no doubt, increase home consumption in agricultural products.

A pronounced shift in our foreign trade during the past few years is the increasing ratio of imports from tropical countries. A study of this situation reveals that over one-half of our imports are of tropical origin (rubber, sugar, coffee, woods, etc.) as against about one-third of such imports before the war. The balance of trade is heavily against us in the Tropics as a whole. A study of the trade of these particular countries indicates that the excess of our imports from those areas over our exports to them is about $500,000,000 per annum, which is largely used by them for the purchase of manufactured goods from Europe, thus to a considerable extent liquidating the excessive balance in our favor in our European trade, created by shipping to Europe our agricultural produce. This triangular operation seems likely to increase, as tropical goods do not materially conflict with our own production and our consumption of these commodities is likely to increase steadily.

CURRENTS IN FOREIGN TRADE.

The effect of tariff on exports: The theoretical assumption that the new tariff will so diminish our imports as to strangle the buying power of foreign countries for our exports does not seem borne out by a critical examination of the actual factors involved. Somewhere between one-third and one-half of foreign buying power for our exports is furnished by invisible exchange. Beyond this, somewhere from 49 to 55 per cent of commodities shipped to us from abroad are upon the free list (based upon application of the Fordney tariff to the 1921–22 imports, where about 60 per cent were free); thus the buying power is untrammeled up to, say, 70 to 80 per cent. The remainder of our imports which are dutiable is in large part such goods as will be imported in any event, as sugar, wool, luxuries, etc. Therefore it would not seem that the gross volume of exports would be very greatly influenced one way or another by the tariff. Generally, the volume of our imports is likely to be increased by the increasing prosperity at home.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. I call up the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the Post Office appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any particular amendment?

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment offered by Mr. SLEMP, of Virginia, on page 19, line 22, relative to the pneumatic tubes.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the question on the other amendments. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLEMP: Page 19, after line 22, insert: "For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50."

THE SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROUSE) there were—ayes 74, nays 27.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 158, nays 81, not voting 192, as follows:

Until further notice:

Mr. Paul with Mr. McClintic.

Mr. Crago with Mr. Sisson.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I also have a motion to recommit if the gentleman is not against the bill. I am against the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Minnesota against the bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, as at present I prefer to have it amended.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman's motion is the same as mine, I prefer to have him make it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want to contend with the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON moves to recommit the bill H. R. 13593 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment, to wit: On page 11, line 10, strike out "$4,250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,750,000," so that as amended the paragraph will read as follows: "For allowances to third-class post offices to cover cost of clerical services, $4,750,000."

Mr. BLANTON. That motion is the same as mine, hence I withdraw my motion to recommit, which likewise offers relief to clerks in third-class post offices.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 6, noes 92.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of no quorum. This is for the rural people.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 94, nays 145, not voting 190, as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Atkeson with Mr. Cantrill.

Mr. Johnson of South Dakota with Mr. Rayburn.

Mr. Taylor of Tennessee with Mr. Favrot.

Mr. Yates with Mr. Martin.

Mr. Chandler of Oklahoma with Mr. Raker.

Mr. Mott with Mr. Johnson of Kentucky.

Mr. Mudd with Mr. Hardy of Texas.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13374, the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I notice the Senate has increased the appropriation for the training of Naval Reserve officers a million dollars. When that item was under consideration in the House attention was directed to the fact that the Naval Reserve Force was getting two or three times what was provided for similar service in the Army. I do not think such a large increase can be justified at all. I shall not ask for a separate vote on this item, but shall expect, judging from the remarks made by the chairman of the subcommittee, that he is not in sympathy with it and will protest to the utmost against the allowance of this extravagant increase.

Mr. MADDEN. I will make this statement to the gentleman from Wisconsin: After I saw what the Senate did on this matter and heard the rumor that it was likely that the Secretary of the Navy might restore the reserves to the pay roll, I wrote him a letter to the effect that I hoped he would not do anything of that sort until this bill became a law, because we did not know what it might contain, or whether it would contain anything. I will say to the gentleman that I am not friendly to the item, and I will do my best.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman does his best, I know it will not be included in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether or no any of the so-called Britten rehabilitation program has been placed by the Senate in this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind giving us his attitude on that so-called rehabilitation plan?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is before the Committee on Appropriations now, and I would not like to commit the Committee on Appropriations by making any statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Until the gentleman converses with them?

Mr. MADDEN. Until I see them.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows whether the words "as soon as practicable" have been inserted in the last paragraph of the bill—the so-called Kelley paragraph? The subchairman stated on the floor, I believe, that he intended to have them put it in if possible.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no change whatsoever in the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is in controversy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. FRENCH, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that motion?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ROBERT B. GORDON.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the news reached the House upon its assembling at noon that Mr. Robert B. Gordon, familiarly known to most of the Members of the House as "Bob" Gordon, died in this city last night while on a visit here. Mr. Gordon was a Representative from Ohio in the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses. Subsequently he became Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, serving in that capacity for eight years. The news of his death will, I know, come to those Members who knew him with the very greatest regret.

He was a man of lovable character, full of accommodation for all men, all Members, irrespective of party; genial, lovable, fine in every respect. The unusual esteem in which he was held by the House and the love and affection that were entertained for him by all Members, as I frequently heard it expressed during the days of his service as Sergeant at Arms, causes me to feel justified in making this statement.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, those of us who served with Mr. Gordon in the House remember him as a very faithful and very efficient Member, and those of us who were Members during the period when he was an officer in the House recall his services in that capacity as of the finest character. He was always faithful, always considerate, and was in all respects a public servant of the very best character. We all very greatly regret his passing away.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on January 2 they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 13232. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13180. An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13346. An act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 4, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

858. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting copies of two proposed bills, one authorizing the acquisition by the Secretary of Commerce of additional land for the enlargement of the present site of the Bureau of Standards and the other authorizing the construction of a power-plant building on the present site of that bureau; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

859. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Governor of the Panama Canal recommending legislation which will enable the President to lease the oil and coaling plants at Cristobal and Balboa, Canal Zone, to private parties; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

860. Letters from the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting recommendations for a Federal building program throughout the United States, and submitting a table showing the number of leases and approximately the amount of rents paid for buildings for Federal use (H. Doc. No. 523); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FESS: Committee on the Library. S. J. Res. 251. A joint resolution providing for the filling of two vacancies that will occur on January 14, 1923, and March 1, 1923, respectively, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress; without amendment (Rept. No. 1324). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 4, 1923.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 3, 1923.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, House bill 12817.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me to present a report? I will say to the Senator that it will take me about 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah for the purpose indicated?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

REPORT OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSION.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I present a report from the Public Buildings Commission. The commission instructs me as its chairman to submit the following report to the Senate:

Since making its last report on June 3 this year the Public Buildings Commission has effected one conspicuous saving in the amount the Government is now spending for the rental and upkeep of office buildings in the city of Washington. Reference is made to the Hooe Building, at 1330 F Street, which was vacated by the prohibition unit on November 1, thereby effecting a saving in rental and maintenance charges amounting to approximately $75,000 a year. This saving has been partially offset by increases in the rental of the Department of Justice Building and the Atlantic Building, occupied by the United States Forest Service. The commission is now endeavoring to make arrangements whereby the Department of Justice can be transferred to the Munitions Building or some other fireproof Government-owned structure and thus eliminate the exorbitant rental of $75,000 per annum which the department is paying for its present quarters. It is also the purpose of the commission to require the Forest Service to vacate the Atlantic Building as soon as suitable space can be made available in a Government-owned building.

The commission has in the past few months conducted intensive room-by-room surveys of the new Interior, Navy, and Munitions Buildings. The survey of the Interior Building brought out the fact that some 28,000 square feet of space could be saved by a better arrangement of personnel and equipment. As a result the department has been required to provide space in the building for the United States Coal Commission and to bring in the Bureau of Education from the Pension Office Building, thus relieving a congested situation in that structure.

The surveys also disclosed that 51,000 square feet of space can be made available in the Navy Building and 129,443 square feet in the Munitions Building. It is, of course, the purpose of the commission to make every effort to have this surplus space utilized to the best possible advantage.

Aside from the larger activities enumerated herein, the commission is constantly engaged in making numerous routine assignments of office space and such consolidations and rearrangements as appear to be for the best interests of the Government service as a whole.

The following tabulation shows the amounts the various departments were expending for the rental of office space on May 22, 1919, about the time this commission was organized, and the amounts being expended for rentals on December 1, 1922:

Department.	Annual rental, May 22, 1919.	Annual rental, Dec. 1, 1922.
Agriculture	$190,910.00	$146,710.00
Alien Property Custodian	31,200.00	----------
Civil Service Commission	16,875.00	16,875.00
Commerce	66,900.00	65,500.00
Court of Customs Appeals	7,000.00	7,000.00
Employees' Compensation Commission	3,600.00	----------
Federal Board for Vocational Training	6,400.00	----------
Federal Trade Commission	12,600.00	----------
General Accounting Office	----------	64,900.00
Interior	23,000.00	----------
International Boundary Commission	2,040.00	----------
International Joint Commission	1,724.00	----------
Interstate Commerce Commission	72,058.04	72,058.04
Justice	36,000.00	78,000.00
Labor	58,368.60	24,000.00
Panama Canal Office	7,500.00	----------
Railroad Administration [1]	86,985.00	----------
Shipping Board	210,105.56	----------
State	5,000.00	----------
Tariff Commission	11,000.00	----------
Treasury	174,339.00	42,150.00
War	111,797.08	7,500.00

[1] Rental for building occupied by the Railroad Administration is now being paid by funds derived from operation of the railroads.

A total of $13,500 has been appropriated by Congress for the expenses of the Public Buildings Commission, of which amount there is now an unexpended balance of $2,922.65 in the Treasury.

PURCHASE OF THE SITES OF THE TEMPORARY BUILDINGS WEST OF SEVENTEENTH STREET.

The independent offices appropriation act approved June 12, 1922, appropriated $1,500,000 for the purchase of seven squares of ground between Eighteenth and Twenty-first Streets and between B Street and New York Avenue NW. This appropriation was based upon options which had been secured previous to the passage of the act, but there was considerable delay in the passage of the bills, so that the options expired before it became a law. It was feared that some difficulty would be met in securing this land at the option figures, due to the fact that the options had expired before the funds became available. In reality, however, the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy buildings reports that the purchases are being made at considerably lower figures on the average than the option figures. As an illustration of this, the square occupied by the War Trade buildings, known as temporary No. 5, between B and C Streets and between Twentieth and Twenty-first Streets NW., was purchased at an average cost of approximately $1.95 per square foot. An appraisal recently made by a disinterested board placed that value at $2.75 per square foot. In this one square alone there is an approximate saving of $75,000 over the appraised valuation. It is believed that the purchase of all the seven squares, which has now been consummated or is in process of satisfactory negotiations, will result in a saving of between $250,000 and $300,000 over the estimates upon which the appropriation was based.

A PUBLIC BUILDING PROGRAM.

One fact which is becoming more evident each day is that the Government should at the earliest possible moment embark upon a building program which will lead to the housing of all departments and independent establishments in permanent Government-owned structures. The commission is rapidly approaching a point where it will be impossible to effect further reductions in rentals unless new buildings be erected. To illustrate the urgent necessity for immediate action, the attention of Congress is directed to the fact that there are now in existence 12 of the so-called temporary war buildings, comprising a total floor area of 2,380,559 square feet. The best judgment of those in position to know is that these structures can not possibly last more than 8 or 10 years longer, and even then it will probably be necessary to spend vast sums for their repair. In fact, one of them is deteriorating so rapidly at this time that the constant expenditure of considerable funds is necessary to make it habitable. The building referred to is the old War Industries Building at Fourteenth and B Streets and occupied by an important unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

It is very evident that immediate steps should be taken to replace these structures with permanent buildings. While officials in charge of them take the most elaborate precautions against fire and are doing everything that is humanly possible to guard against it, nevertheless the danger is always present. Their destruction by fire would almost certainly entail the loss of valuable and, in many cases, irreplaceable records, as well as the possibility of loss of human life. The Government would then be forced to rent private buildings at a tremendous outlay of money.

Aside from the urgent necessity of replacing the temporary buildings, there are other and equally as serious situations demanding relief.

The present haphazard housing of the Department of Agriculture is cited as an example. This department, one of the worst-housed institutions in the city, occupies 22 buildings of all possible types, in widely scattered locations. It does not require a very discerning mind to picture the great economy and increased efficiency which would inevitably result from bringing this great activity together in one location in buildings adapted to its needs.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department is another activity which is suffering by reason of inadequate housing. This important unit should by all means be housed in one building, instead of being distributed around in nine different locations as at present. Officials of the bureau estimate that a saving of 25 to 30 per cent in the cost of collection of taxes could be effected should they be housed in one building.

The General Accounting Office, now located in 19 different buildings, would function with highly increased efficiency if located in one building.

The erection of the following buildings at an early date is earnestly recommended:

1. A modern office building, well lighted, with appropriate but simple finish, on square east of 88, between Twentieth and Twenty-first Streets and B and C Streets NW., land now owned by the United States and admirably adapted to the construction of an office building; this building to be approximately six stories and basement, providing a floor space of 900,000 square feet, sufficient to take care of both the internal revenue office and the Comptroller General's office.

2. The demolition of the buildings south of Pennsylvania Avenue, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets NW., and the erection thereon of the three buildings for which plans have already been prepared, with such modifications in the plans that will make it possible to meet the present-day needs of the departments.

3. The procurement of a site for the construction of an archives building and the construction of this building according to plans already completed and approved.

4. The erection of 15 stories of steel filing stacks in the interior court of the Pension Office Building at an estimated cost of $1,000,000. If these stacks are installed it will result in making of the Pension Office Building an ideal archives building. That building is fireproof and is isolated from other buildings. In addition, there is no heating plant in it, as it is heated from the Land Office Building. The danger from fire, therefore, would seem to be reduced to an absolute minimum.

There are summarized below the arguments for the erection of these stacks in the court of the Pension Office Building:

(a) A building admirably adapted for the purpose is already erected.

(b) The present use of the building could continue without interference.

(c) The court in which it is contemplated erecting the steel stacks contains 4,000,000 cubic feet of space, practically all of which is wasted.

(d) The proposed stacks, if installed, would make use of 2,894,008 cubic feet of space which is now wasted.

(e) The proposed stacks would provide 729,929 linear feet of shelving (approximately 138 miles), or 220,356 shelves (not including top shelves), with a net filing capacity of 948,900 cubic feet.

(f) The estimated cost of erecting an archives building to accommodate an equal amount of shelving, including necessary stairways, elevators, corridors, toilets, etc., would be $1,680,000. This figure is based upon a cost of $0.56 per cubic foot for a building of 3,000,000 cubic feet capacity. This cost is very reasonable. In addition, the shelving for such a building would cost $500,000, and the land would represent an outlay of $200,000 more. The total cost would therefore be $2,380,000 (approximately).

(g) The cost of making provision for the same amount of filing space for the Pension Office Building would be approximately $1,000,000.

(h) If a new archives building were erected it would be necessary to provide a force for guarding it and for maintaining and operating it. If these shelves are erected in the Pension Office Building, the present guard and maintenance forces would not have to be augmented. The only additional cost would be for electricity for lighting.

(i) If these filing stacks were installed an almost unlimited amount of space now occupied by files in office buildings could be relinquished for office purposes. A study is being made as to approximately how much office space could be given up as a result of the erection of these stacks and the saving which would result through the giving up of rented buildings.

Data concerning the proposed filing stacks in the interior court of the Pension Office Building.

Estimated cost of proposed filing stacks in interior court of the Pension Office Building	$1,000,000
Net cubic capacity	948,900
Total number of shelves (not including top shelves)	220,356
Total number of shelves (including top shelves)	224,052
Linear feet of shelves (not including top shelves)	729,929
Linear feet of shelves (including top shelves)	742,172
Total length in miles of shelves (not including top shelves) equal approximately	138
Estimated cubage of building that would be required for this amount of shelving if placed in rooms of ordinary type	3,000,000
Estimated cost of erection of this amount of shelving if placed in such a building	$500,000
Estimated cost of erection of such a building	$1,680,000
Cubage of court	4,000,000
Cubage of building	6,170,200
Cubage of space occupied by stacks	2,894,008

Estimated annual saving to the Government as a result of the installation of these stacks.

500,000 square feet of space released at estimated annual cost, including maintenance, of 80 cents per square foot		$400,000
Less:
Interest on $1,000,000 at 4½ per cent	$42,500
Lighting and cleaning 390,000 square feet of space in filing stacks (only maintenance work required) at 10 cents per square foot	39,000
		81,500
Net saving per annum, in addition to annual saving		318,500
Value of steel filing cases released and made available for use at approximately $3 per square foot (cost is about $6 per square foot) for one-half area of stacks		600,000

Another great need, as the commission sees it, is the erection of a large fireproof warehouse in a suitable location for the use of the General Supply Committee. Their supplies are now stored for the most part in the old barrack buildings in East Potomac Park. These structures, aside from being eyesores in a public park, are rapidly falling to pieces and afford but little protection to the goods stored there.

This commission is unanimously of the opinion that Congress should at once authorize the expenditure of some twenty-five or thirty million dollars for the construction of suitable public buildings in Washington. This amount could be appropriated at the rate of two or three million dollars per annum, and should this recommendation be favorably acted upon it is confidently believed that within a few years all Government activities in Washington will be housed in permanent fireproof buildings. It is also recommended that the Public Buildings Commission be designated as the agency which shall decide which buildings are to be built and where they are to be located. This will enable the commission to lay out the plans of housing the various departments and will make it possible to consider the whole matter from the broad general viewpoint of the best interests of the Government. In the past it has been the custom of the various departments and bureaus to submit their individual building needs to Congress, without regard to any general plan, and this has naturally resulted, and will continue to result, in numbers of buildings being most unfortunately located. The commission, having had nearly four years' experience in dealing with the assignment of space in the public buildings, believes it is qualified to say just what the needs of each department are and where the buildings should be located.

It is suggested that the legislation herein proposed authorize the commission to submit an estimate to the Director of the Budget each year prior to the December session of Congress, which estimate shall state the amount required for carrying on the work for the ensuing fiscal year. It is also suggested that the commission be authorized to apportion the work of preparation of plans, letting of contracts, and supervision of construction of the buildings herein proposed among such agencies of the Government as appear best qualified to do the work.

Thus it would merely be the duty of the commission to—

1. Submit the annual estimates to the Director of the Budget as outlined above.

2. Decide what buildings are actually needed by each department and bureau.

3. Decide what type of building is to be built.

4. Decide where each building is to be located.

The various buildings recommended herein could be constructed under the general authorization suggested above. The commission earnestly hopes that Congress will take some action in the near future with a view to the adequate housing of the Federal departments.

During the reading of the report by Mr. SMOOT,

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what building it is where there is now so much waste space?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the old Pension Office Building. The Senator has been in it and knows that in the center of it there is a space that is not occupied for any purpose, but is a perfect waste of valuable space. We can put steel stacks in there, and in that way save over 2,000,000 cubic feet of space in other buildings which is occupied now for storage purposes. I have the blue prints, I will say to the Senator, and the estimated cost for putting the 15 stories of steel stacks in the Pension Office Building would be not to exceed $1,000,000, and we would save at least $600,000 every year thereafter as a result.

Mr. FLETCHER. The stacks are proposed for storage purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. For record purposes. Not only that, but the Senator knows that the records of the departments now in many cases are placed in large boxes and the lids fastened down and the boxes stored in space which might otherwise be occupied by employees of the Government. When a paper contained in one of those boxes is needed, it is necessary to send four or five colored men, who have, perhaps, to take four or five of those great boxes down in order to find the one desired, open it, and fish out of that box the paper that is wanted, sometimes taking days to do it, whereas if we had the stacks all these papers could be stored in them and cross-indexed, so that any person could go and find a desired paper within five minutes after reaching the building.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator the present status of the project for an archives building?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will notice that the commission have recommended that the building be erected, and if the recommendations of the commission shall be followed out the building will be erected.

Mr. OVERMAN. To what commission does the Senator from Utah refer—to the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I refer to the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where is it proposed that these new buildings shall be erected?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from North Carolina had been present he would have known that I have already made a statement as to that. For instance, we recommend that three of the principal buildings shall be erected on the squares just south of the Willard Hotel. The Government owns those two squares, together with the street running between them. The commission recommends that the old buildiings now occupying that site shall be demolished and that three buildings be erected there.

I will also say to the Senator that the plans for those buildings, which have already been drawn, were adopted by the old commission of which, I think, the Senator from North Carolina was a member.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has a site been selected for the archives building?

Mr. SMOOT. There was a site selected for that building, but, as the Senator knows, there was objection made here on the floor of the Senate by one of the Senators in the closing days of the session. When an appropriation was asked for, if I remember correctly, the House did appropriate the money for the erection of the building on that site. I have forgotten the exact location, but I think it was down where Eighteenth Street runs between B and C Streets. There is a square there on which the Fine Arts Commission have recommended that the archives building be located. That commission has also passed upon the plans for the building.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Utah states that the other House voted to appropriate the money to construct a building on that site?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What became of the appropriation when the bill carrying it came to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate did not agree to it, and the item went out of the appropriation bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And the result is that we have the site, but as yet have no appropriation for the building?

Mr. SMOOT. No, we have not the site; for the bill carrying the appropriation for the building also provided for the purchase of ground for the site.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So we have neither the site nor the money appropriated for the building?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as yet.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, one of the most urgent needs of this Government is for a modern fireproof archives building.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask for an appropriation of a million dollars in the proper appropriation bill to build the proposed steel stacks and to place them in the Pension Office. Should that appropriation be made, it will take care of many of the ordinary current records of the Government. That, however, will not interfere at all with the plan of erecting an archives building, I will say to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to say that as long ago as 1911, while I had the honor of being chairman of the Public Buildings Committee of the House of Representatives, that committee conducted an exhaustive investigation as to the status of the files and papers of the various governmental departments; and even at that time it was shown that the need for such a building was most urgent; that records of an invaluable nature were in danger of destruction; and that many of them were practically inaccessible.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Texas is correct. I wish again to emphasize the fact that if $1,000,000 be appropriated for that purpose the shelving space which will be furnished to the Government in the old Pension Office Building will aggregate 138 miles of linear feet; there will be 15 stories of shelving; and it will not cost the Government of the United States for maintenance a cent other than, perhaps, the electric lights which may be necessary on dark days or in evenings or mornings so that those desiring to examine the papers and records may go to the different stacks and get them.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Utah if the space which he proposes shall be utilized in the Pension Office Building will be in addition to the proposed archives building?

Mr. SMOOT. It will.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, what I am getting at is, what would be the necessity of spending a million dollars to provide facilities in the Pension Bureau if it is proposed to erect an archives building which will have sufficient space to take care of all of the records of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the archives building as proposed will not be large enough to take care of all the records of the Government; but if so, the stacks we propose to purchase now can be used in the archives building. The provision to be made in the Pension Office will always be needed; there can be no question about that. We want a place there where the current records of the Government may be available at any time in order that it may be possible to secure a Government record or paper without hunting days for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is this debate proceeding by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has assumed that that was the case. Does the Senator object?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object to the Senator from Utah making his report and reading it; but I do not think this is the place or the time for discussing all the details of the report.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Connecticut objects, I will not take a moment further of the time of the Senate; but when an opportune time presents itself I will submit my report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I said I did not object to anything the Senator from Utah wanted to say; but I do object to the interruptions which lead to the discussion of the details which are no part of the report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am nearly through with my report, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senator, but I am a little curious to know whether or not it is intended to spend a million dollars on stacks in a building which I am sure is not fireproof?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is just such interruptions as that I rose to object to, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, the Pension Office is not a fireproof building.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to debate, though I do not object to the Senator from Utah reading his report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know he has, but some other Senator has not the floor, and I object to the Senator from Utah being interrupted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will conclude the presentation of the report.

The reading of the report having been concluded, it was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	George	McKellar	Sheppard
Brandegee	Glass	McKinley	Smith
Brookhart	Harreld	McLean	Smoot
Bursum	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Calder	Harrison	Nelson	Stanfield
Cameron	Heflin	New	Stanley
Capper	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Sterling
Caraway	Johnson	Norris	Sutherland
Couzens	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Overman	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Pepper	Wadsworth
Dial	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Ladd	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	La Follette	Pomerene	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Ransdell	Weller
Fletcher	McCormick	Reed, Mo.	Williams
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Robinson

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is necessarily absent on account of serious illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SHEPPARD resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday. The entire speech will be published hereafter.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Labor World, May 27, 1922.]

WHERE'S WILSON'S LEAGUE? ASKS NEWS-TRIBUNE; MCCARTHY REPLIES—PARTY WOULD DESTROY WORLD'S CIVILIZATION.

Here is an able and instructive criticism of an editorial in the Duluth News-Tribune on "Where, oh, where is the League of Nations?" Mr. McCarthy tells 'em. He blames the Republican Party for the present European crisis and for the 5,000,000 unemployed workers in America.

Mr. McCarthy is a life-long Republican. He served as a member of the Minnesota Senate in the sessions of 1899 and 1901. He is one of the best-informed men in America on world events. His familiarity with them led him to follow closely the work of Woodrow Wilson. As an American he refused to join with his party in the assassination of the world's civilization by killing the League of Nations. His contribution in this number of the Labor World is a terrific indictment against the Harding administration.

REPUBLICANS MADE IT IMPOTENT, GRAND RAPIDS MAN DECLARES—PRESENT WORLD CRISIS DUE TO UNITED STATES.

The May 15, 1922, issue of the Duluth News-Tribune contained an editorial entitled "Where, oh, where is the league?" As it is a fair sample of the systematic scheme or plan of the Republican Party to mislead the public and make the League of Nations odious, we will give it some attention. It said:

"Where is the League of Nations? In a physical sense it is at Geneva, but in the sense of being worth a continental in the present European crisis it is nowhere.

"It is not easy to realize that Woodrow Wilson all but ruined his health for so inefficient a thing.

"It is impotent and gives no promise of accomplishing anything save finding a place in the budget of certain nations. Americans make errors like unto other peoples, but they at least did not make the stupendous blunder of joining the League of Nations."

We will dissect and analyze this stereotyped and canned Republican propaganda. It contains eight assertions:

1. That there is a present European crisis.
2. That this crisis is ominous, foreboding, portentous of danger.
3. That it ought to be adjusted, removed.
4. That there is a League of Nations.
5. That this league should have adjusted the trouble.
6. That the league is impotent, unable to remove the danger.
7. That the Republican Party prevented America joining the league.
8. That we did well not to join it.

With the first assertions or positions we have no quarrel. We will consider the eighth and discuss it solely from the standpoint or viewpoint of America's selfish interests—safety, security, business, pecuniary gain, material advantage. That puts us in the field of the avowed foreign policy of the Republican Party, "Islands, Oil, Dollars." The discussion will be on familiar ground.

WHOLE EARTH INVOLVED.

This present European crisis commenced July 28, 1914. From the beginning it involved the whole earth.

It still involves all nations, including the United States. In 1917 it dragged this country into a world war.

It dug the graves of 81,000 American soldiers.

It wounded, mangled, and disabled 250,000 other American soldiers.

It sowed the seeds of disease and death in the bodies of hundreds of thousands of other American soldiers.

It compelled us to loan over $11,000,000,000 to European nations which can never be repaid until the crisis passes.

It compelled this Nation to contract a national public indebtedness of $24,000,000,000, which we must pay.

COSTS MORE THAN WAR.

It compels us now to expend the enormous sum of over $1,000,000 per day for hospital service for the wrecked and ruined lives of those who, but for it, would be self-supporting American citizens.

It caused us to suffer a financial loss in 1921 of over $24,000,000,000, a greater sum than it cost us to fight the war.

It is causing this country to lose millions of dollars every day, right now, because of industrial conditions in Europe and throughout the world.

It compelled over 5,000,000 able-bodied Americans to tramp the streets and highways during 1921, looking for work and finding it not.

It promises to continue these conditions indefinitely into the future.

AMERICA AGAINST WAR.

At the close of the World War America's selfish interests required a settlement that would accomplish two things; one, that we should not be dragged by foreign nations into another war as we were into that one; and two, that the industries of the world, especially of Europe, should be promptly reestablished.

Europe owed us $11,000,000,000 and we needed the money. We could get neither principal nor interest until Europe went to work. America is able to produce sufficient to have a foreign trade represented by exports and imports of $15,000,000,000 annually. Because we can so produce, our domestic internal business and prosperity requires this foreign trade.

Of our total foreign trade over two-thirds is with Europe, when Europe is in a normal business condition. Every mill, mine, factory, and farm in America depends on the prosperity of Europe.

WILSON SAW CLEARLY.

At the close of the war there was one man in America who saw, understood, and appreciated the vital interest we had in a proper settlement of the war. That man was Woodrow Wilson. He knew that Europe could not do business with us to the amount of two-thirds of our foreign trade unless Europe settled down to business; that it was vital to us that Europe should settle down to business promptly.

He also knew that the only way to prevent political chaos, anarchy, and probable war likely to again involve America was to get Europe on her feet industrially. These things he set out to accomplish. He had in mind the welfare of his own country, the prosperity of his native land. He would save America from future wars, and give her a world-wide field in which to expand and develop.

RICHEST IN WORLD.

His country was the richest in the world, made so by the war.

It was the creditor nation of the world, made so by the war.

It was the most powerful nation on earth, left so by the war.

Its mills, factories, mines, forests, and farms were all intact, ready for business.

It had unlimited resources, natural and artificial; labor, skilled and unskilled. It was ready to supply the world.

Restore stable conditions in Europe and America could do the rest.

Establish sound credit in Europe and America would lift the stricken nations into the sunlight of prosperity.

LEAGUE WAS NECESSARY.

This he would accomplish by two things; one, a League of Nations; two, a reasonable settlement and adjustment of the obligations of Germany. Beginning in 1914 and continuing to the fall of 1918 America had considered and discussed the necessity of a League of Nations.

It was the consensus of opinion that such a league was necessary and that the time had arrived to create it. The key to a return of normal industrial conditions in Europe was the matter of German restitution and reparations. To accomplish a settlement of these matters required freedom from hatred, malice, and the passions engendered by the war.

At the close of the war there was but one nation on earth so conditioned as to be able to lead and guide the stricken world to a sensible, reasonable peace. That nation was the United States. No nation had a greater interest in the establishment of such a peace. Our financial interests, our industrial prosperity required it. One would have supposed that America would have been a unit, standing solidly in support of President Wilson and his administration in his efforts to secure such settlement. But such was not the case.

BEGAN TO CONSPIRE.

America, under the influence and guidance of the then Republican leaders, commenced, in December, 1918, and continued during the entire negotiations and work of the peace commission at Paris, to undermine, discredit, and destroy the standing, influence, and power of both President Wilson and the Nation at Paris.

The scheme was to make it appear in France, to cause the Peace Conference to believe that President Wilson did not represent America; that America was opposed to what he there advocated; that America was not in favor of a league of nations, and was not in accord with the President's ideas as to what would be a reasonable or sensible settlement with Germany.

In the matter of German restitution and reparations, these American conspirators declared that America stood with those who demanded the utmost of Germany, and that Mr. Wilson was trying to secure a "soft peace" for Germany, to let Germany off easy, to assist Germany in her efforts to escape restitution and reparation.

HARVEY'S TREASON.

By March, 1919, the Republican partisan press of this country filled the air with denunciations of President Wilson's attitude and objects in the matter of German reparations. The entire propaganda was prepared and carried on pursuant to a carefully arranged plan to accomplish the defeat of everything advocated by the President at Paris. The scheme was to ruin him and his cause; to destroy him.

The climax was reached by a false and libelous cartoon printed and published in the April 26, 1919, issue of Harvey's Weekly. The picture covered two full pages of the magazine. At the left was the symbolical figure or statue of Justice, standing erect, blindfolded, holding in her left hand the scales and in her right the sword. At the right, facing Justice, with hands uplifted in remonstrance and protest, stands President Wilson. Immediately behind him, crouching to the ground, skulking, hiding, is Germany, represented by the usual cartoon of a booted, helmeted, uniformed Hun. Underneath are the words "The Protector of the Huns."

INFAMOUS AND DAMNABLE.

Considering that picture in the light of what it expressed as to the attitude of America in the then crisis of the world, and in the light of the disastrous financial and industrial results actually experienced by America because of it, and in the light of present world conditions, it was probably the most infamous and damnable ever printed and published on this globe. But he who did it, whose genius put the soul of the Republican Party into it, has been rewarded for it by appointment as American ambassador to the Court of St. James.

The conspirators succeeded. American influence was reduced by their work to such an extent that a sensible adjustment of German reparations was not made, with the result that all Europe is still in turmoil, in a state of industrial chaos, to the damage of America in the sum of billions of dollars.

ULTIMATELY KILLED IT.

They succeeded also as to the League of Nations. While they failed in their efforts during the negotiations of the treaty to kill it, they have ultimately succeeded. Notwithstanding that 51 nations entered into it, signed the solemn compact, the written treaty, in good faith, hoping, trusting thereby to save the world, these conspirators have labored for three years to destroy it.

* * * * * * *

The League of Nations is impotent in the present crisis in Europe. There is nothing to take its place, to the great glee of that party. Meanwhile our industries languish and 5,000,000 able-bodied Americans are unemployed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented the petition of Rawlins Lodge, No. 5, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Rawlins, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a resolution adopted by Local Union, No. 1556, United Mine Workers of America, of Russellville, Ark., favoring prompt action by the Federal Government to remedy the faulty condition of railroad operating equipment, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KENDRICK presented the petition of Rawlins Lodge, No. 5, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Rawlins, Wyo., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Laramie (Wyo.) Council of Industry, protesting against the recommendation made by the Budget Bureau to appropriate only $3,000,000 for forest roads and trails and urging the appropriation of $6,500,000, the amount authorized by the act of June 19, 1922, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of Oscar Schmitler and seven other citizens of Wolford, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to stabilize the prices of farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of Rev. G. Wullschleger and 32 other citizens and of W. E. Lohr and 47 other citizens, all of Judson and vicinity, in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORBECK presented the petitions of Mahlon T. Lightner and 47 other citizens of Edmunds County and of M. L. Stavig and 132 other citizens of Roberts County, in the State of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation to stabilize the prices of farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Java and Mound City, S. Dak., praying the enactment of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4030) for the relief of Capt. Murray A. Cobb, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 968) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 419) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Esperanza (Rept. No. 969);

A bill (S. 420) for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co. (Rept. No. 970); and

A bill (S. 421) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Lexington (Rept. No. 971).

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3668) for the relief of Gertrude Lustig (Rept. No. 972);

A bill (H. R. 966) for the relief of the Tacoma Tug & Barge Co. (Rept. No. 973);

A bill (H. R. 2049) for the relief of the Delaware River Lightering Co. (Rept. No. 974);

A bill (H. R. 3461) for the relief of Eugene Fazzi (Rept. No. 975);

A bill (H. R. 4619) for the relief of the Link-Belt Co., of Philadelphia, Pa. (Rept. No. 976);

A bill (H. R. 4620) for the relief of Th. Brovig (Rept. No. 977);

A bill (H. R. 4622) for the relief of the Lloyd Mediterraneo Societa Italiana di Navigazione, owners of the Italian steamer Titania (Rept. No. 978);

A bill (H. R. 5249) for the relief of Ephraim Lederer, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania (Rept. No. 979);

A bill (H. R. 5648) for the relief of Ike T. Boyles (Rept. No. 980);

A bill (H. R. 6177) for the relief of the owner of the fishing smack Mary S. Dolbow (Rept. N . 981);

A bill (H. R. 8214) to compensate the owners of the American steamship Vindal for damages and expenses in repairing the said steamship, and to make an appropriation therefor (Rept. No. 982);

A bill (H. R. 9887) for the relief of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. (Rept. No. 983); and

A bill (H. R. 10287) for the relief of John Calvin Starr (Rept. No. 984).

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3503) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Commercial Pacific Cable Co., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 985) thereon.

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and submitted a report (No. 986) thereon.

Mr. LADD (for Mr. NORRIS), from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8086) to prohibit the shipment of filled milk in interstate or foreign commerce, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 987) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 4269) to create a commission of investigation in connection with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 4270) to validate certain allotments of land made to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin; and

A bill (S. 4271) to amend section 1 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906, entitled 'An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes'"; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 4272) granting a pension to Henry Rabbes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COUZENS:

A bill (S. 4273) authorizing and directing the Treasurer of the United States to convey certain land in section 21, Huron County, Mich., to the Pointe Aux Barques Resort Association; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4274) to provide for the organization of the Organized Reserves in the Philippine Islands; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4275) incorporating the Supreme Lodge of the World, Loyal Order of Moose; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BROUSSARD:

A bill (S. 4276) for the relief of Maj. Russell B. Putnam; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TERMS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2228) to amend certain sections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMERICAN PROPERTY INTERESTS IN THE ISLE OF PINES.

Mr. POMERENE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 392), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate how many citizens of the United States have landed or other property interest in the Isle of Pines, and the amount and value of such lands and other property owned by them.

SHIPPING BOARD CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 393), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is authorized and directed to investigate the cause of the dissolution of the Claims Commission which was constituted to examine and pass upon claims against the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, which was dissolved and abolished by Chairman Lasker of the Shipping Board in an order issued December 19 and made effective December 31, 1922; to investigate the activities and work of said commission and ascertain the results of the same, and whether the work of said commission was advantageous to the Government, and what, if any, reasons existed for the discontinuance of said commission; to ascertain the amount of outstanding claims against the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and the proposed methods of dealing with the same, and whether or not said methods will be more advantageous to the Government than the handling of such claims by the Claims Commission; and report its findings and recommendations to the Senate in the premises. Said committee may send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and employ such clerical assistance as may be necessary, and may appoint a subcommittee to exercise the powers and duties conferred upon said committee by this resolution.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SPENCER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 394), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 328, agreed to September 13, 1922, authorizing the Committee on Indian Affairs to continue the employment of an assistant clerk, payable out of the contingent fund, until the end of the present Congress, be, and the same hereby is, further continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

AMERICAN REPRESENTATION ON REPARATION COMMISSION.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANFIELD in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	McKellar	Smoot
Borah	Harreld	McKinley	Spencer
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Stanfield
Brookhart	Heflin	Myers	Stanley
Calder	Hitchcock	New	Sutherland
Cameron	Johnson	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Kellogg	Overman	Underwood
Couzens	Kendrick	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Ladd	Pittman	Warren
Dial	La Follette	Poindexter	Watson
Elkins	Lenroot	Pomerene	Weller
Fletcher	Lodge	Robinson
Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Sheppard
George	McCumber	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is with some hesitation, and with a sense of both personal and official responsibility, that I bring before the Senate at this time a measure of great importance respecting the foreign relations of this Government.

So many influences have been at work, and still continue their efforts, to fashion public sentiment in the United States and to influence the official action of this Government, that it is quite difficult to ascertain sufficient facts upon which to form a decisive opinion as to what course this Nation should take respecting the problems that distress European peoples and prevent the normal conduct of their affairs. Within an hour it has been said to me by a well-informed citizen, in whom I have great confidence, that propagandist influences of a powerful character are now at work to induce this Government to change its policy respecting European controversies, and to participate in the settlement of them, and if such counsel prevails we may be led into serious and costly error.

From the signing of the armistice it has seemed to me necessary that this Government should have a share in the adjustment of the acute problems which embarrass the nations of Europe, and which are the outgrowth of the great conflict which the armistice terminated.

It will be remembered that President Wilson, while the treaty of Versailles was pending in the Senate, submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], a somewhat informal communication, a letter, in which he expressed the opinion that it was necessary and advisable for this Government to have temporary representation on the Reparation Commission. President Harding was then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, with other members of that committee constituting a majority, took the position that until the treaty of Versailles had been ratified by the Senate it was not proper or competent that this Government should have representation on any commission created by that treaty. The President then adopted the policy of securing information as to the action and deliberations of the commission through the medium of unofficial observers; and President Harding, as I shall later show, continued that policy.

When the separate treaty of peace between this Nation and the German Government was entered into, there was incorporated section 4 of Article II, which is as follows:

> That while the United States is privileged to participate in the Reparation Commission, according to the terms of part 8 of that treaty, and in any other commission established under the treaty or under any agreement supplemental thereto, the United States is not bound to participate in any such commission unless it shall elect to do so.

And in the resolution of ratification this provision was inserted:

> The United States shall not be represented or participate in any body, agency, or commission, nor shall any person represent the United States as a member of any body, agency, or commission in which the United States is authorized to participate by this treaty, unless and until an act of the Congress of the United States shall provide for such representation or participation.

By exchanging the ratifications of that treaty the President estopped himself from designating representatives of this Government to serve officially as members of the Reparation Commission.

The incorporation in the resolution of ratification of the provision just read was a most extraordinary proceeding. It would seem to show a lack of confidence on the part of the Senate in the President of the United States, who, under the Constitution, is vested with the control of our foreign relations. If the President had not bound himself by the exchange of ratifications of the treaty containing this provision, it is doubtful if Congress could have taken any action so effectively intrenching upon the constitutional prerogative of the Executive. It is difficult to understand, in the light of recent and current events, why any Executive would willingly become a party to such a limitation on the exercise of his powers. It is inconceivable that any President, whatever his politics or views touching foreign problems, should desire to preserve such a monument to the suspicion and mistrust of his party adherents as exists in the effort to deny him the privilege to appoint representatives for the United States in matters which involve the foreign relations of our Government, even if it be conceded that the provision literally does not infringe upon his rights.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The last sentence of the Senator would seem to me to be rather inconsistent with his previous statement that this action did trench upon the exclusive powers of the President; but does the Senator claim that Congress has nothing whatever to say about what the foreign policy of this country shall be?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not. The Senator from Arkansas claims, however, that the conduct of the foreign relations of this Government is exclusively an Executive function; and if the President, in the conduct of those relations, finds it necessary to appoint an agent, a minister, or an ambassador, that he has the right to do so, and it is doubtful whether the Congress can, by any mere legislative act, estop him from taking the course in that regard which, in his judgment, will promote the best interests of the Nation. I have said, however, that even if it be conceded that the Congress has the power by legislative act to deny the President the right to appoint a representative, an ambassador, or a minister, even though such representative be not accredited to a particular government, even though his services be confined to such services as are performed by members of the Reparation Commission, it is doubtful, in my mind, whether Congress should do that; but such an issue is not important in this discussion, for the reason that the President exchanged the ratifications of the separate treaty of peace with Germany, in which it was provided that no member to serve on any commission created under the Versailles treaty should be appointed except when authorized by an act of Congress. For that reason, believing that the President ought to have the opportunity of appointing a representative of the United States to serve on the Reparation Commission if he thinks such action will conserve the best interests of the Nation, I have introduced a bill authorizing him to do so, and I have put the provision in the form of an act, because the separate treaty of peace with Germany specifies that it must be done by act of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator that the President has the exclusive right of the conduct of our foreign relations, conducting diplomatic intercourse, and negotiating treaties; but there is a grave difference, in my opinion, between the President's right to conduct our foreign relations and the question of what our foreign policy shall be. I never have thought, and do not now think, that the President has a right, of his own motion, to decide what the foreign policy of the United States of America shall be and to go ahead and put it in operation in spite of the wish of the Congress or of the people of the country.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts with pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. Is not the Senator through?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; I have not concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until the Senator has completed his remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the discussion between the Senator from Connecticut and myself is academic and has no very great importance, considering the conditions under which the discussion proceeds, for the reason that the President did exchange the ratifications of the treaty of peace, and that act by him bound him to refrain from appointing a member of the Reparation Commission until Congress consents he shall do so. I have expressed some doubt as to whether an act of Congress denying to the President the right to appoint a member of the Reparation Commission in the exercise of his duty as the Chief Executive of the Nation, to conduct our foreign relations, is an infringement of his constitutional right. The Senator from Connecticut implies that he has no doubt that Congress could say to the President of the United States, by act, that he shall not appoint a minister or an ambassador, a servant or an agent, to represent him in the performance of his duty as the Chief Executive of the Nation, managing the foreign relations of the Government, and that the President would be compelled to respect that act of Congress.

I do not believe that is true. I do not believe the President would be compelled to observe any mere direction of that nature that Congress might give him. But that question, I repeat, loses its importance in this discussion when we recall that the President did exchange the ratifications of a treaty which estopped him from appointing a member of the Reparation Commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to intrude upon the Senator's time——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator knows I have plenty of time. Any suggestion the Senator from Connecticut makes always illuminates a debate, and I am very glad to have him interrupt me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not going to make this suggestion so much for the purpose of illuminating the debate, which I am sure the Senator will sufficiently do without assistance from me, but simply to put myself right. I do not want the Senator to conclude that I inferentially deny, or inferentially from anything I have stated it can be deduced that I deny, the right of the President to appoint ambassadors and other diplomatic representatives, a right which Congress could not deny him. He gets that right from the Constitution. I say now, not particularly because the Senator has verged upon the subject, although, as he says, it may not be particularly related to the pith of the bill he has introduced, it is continually asserted, whenever the Senate or either branch of Congress attempts to express an opinion about our foreign relations or about the wisdom of a proposed policy to be adopted by this country, that we should keep our mouths shut, have no views, or, if we have, suppress them, because the President has exclusive control of the conduct of our foreign relations. I have seen that statement made in the columns of representative newspapers of both parties, I might say metropolitan newspapers, if that gives any added weight to their utterances, and I totally and entirely disagree with them, and I say that if that were true, approximately or remotely true, there would be no sense in having the Senate ratify negotiations of the President which might ripen into treaties. He would be the arbitrary and sole dictator of the policies of this country with respect to foreign relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Connecticut, when he says that he has seen in the metropolitan press statements that the Chief Executive is the absolute dictator respecting our foreign policies——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not say I had seen that statement. I say that if what they say is true, if their theory about it is true, he would be the dictator of our foreign relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. What I wish to say is that I am sure the Senator from Connecticut will not attribute any such statement or position to me. I have never thought or said anything of the kind. I do say, and I have always thought, that in the conduct of our foreign relations, in the negotiation of treaties, in the settlement of international disputes, the Executive, who alone under the Constitution of the United States can carry on that business for the Government, ought to be given a free hand, and that the Congress should not unintelligently interfere in his negotiations and in the performance of his duties.

I respect public sentiment, and I wish that Presidents, I will not say the one now in the White House alone, but that all Presidents would find a way to familiarize themselves with the course of public thought throughout the Nation; that they would learn what the people are thinking on public questions and give consideration to public opinion. But, as the Senator from Connecticut can not dispute, it was a most extraordinary provision that the President should be denied the privilege, if it be conceded it was not a right, to appoint a member of the Reparation Commission to represent the United States, when the fact is considered that the political party to which he belongs at that time had an enormous majority in the Senate of the United States. It can have meant only one thing, that the Senate at that time, as it was then constituted, was so opposed to any participation on the part of this Government in the efforts of European nations to settle their economic and political problems that it was unwilling to give the President of the United States the option, if he found it necessary and advisable to do so, of placing a representative of this Government among the agents who were empowered by an arrangement among the European Governments to settle those problems. I challenge any Senator to escape the force of that conclusion.

The Senate as it was then constituted was so anxious to stand aloof from the difficult and confusing problems that were threatening again the peace of Europe and the peace of the world that they did a very extraordinary thing. I doubt if such a thing was ever done before, and I doubt if it will ever be done again. They tied the hands of the Executive and denied to him the opportunity of doing what he believed to be best in the interest of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not recently examined the language critically, but as I recall it, that language was not only broad enough to exclude any official representative but to exclude any unofficial representative as well; and, as I understand it, the President has already appointed an unofficial representative, or he has an observer there, which is the same thing.

Mr. LODGE. He is not a member.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course, he is not a member.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's suggestion it happens comes at an opportune time. I was just proceeding to discuss that question.

As the result of this limitation of his authority, the President has been driven to a course regarded by many as belittling the dignity of the Executive and the Government. We have what is known as unofficial representation on the Reparation Commission, unofficial observers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield in just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. Boyden, a great lawyer residing in Boston and enjoying a national reputation, serves as the unofficial delegate, while Mr. Logan, of Philadelphia, acts as the underdelegate, as his position is known. Mr. Henry B. Hodge, of Philadelphia, is the general secretariat of the United States unofficial delegation on the Reparation Commission, and Mr. Lloyd Robbins, of San Francisco, Calif., is the unofficial advisor of the delegation, and serves on what is known as the committee of guaranties, which was created under the London agreement and which apparently exercises sovereign authority over Germany.

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say, to make the record correct, that the representation which now exists of course existed from the beginning.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I said that.

Mr. LODGE. I did not so understand the Senator. In fact, the gentlemen appointed by President Wilson were continued by President Harding for some time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made that statement some time ago.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not hear the statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. My information is that, so far as actual labor is concerned, in the investigation of conditions and the decision of controverted questions, this unofficial delegation of our Government has been and is quite influential.

Let me illustrate by a single fact the service that it has rendered. The committee of guaranties, of which I am informed Mr. Lloyd Robbins, of San Francisco, is a member, made an unofficial survey of Germany and submitted a report to the Reparation Commission about October, 1922, which is claimed to be an accurate and complete description of the resources, the economic and financial conditions prevailing throughout the German Republic.

It will be remembered that the committee of guaranties exercises very great power over Germany. As an agent of the Reparation Commission it directs the German people to increase their taxes. As an agent of the Reparation Commission it reduces at will the German budget. It is exercising sovereign authority over the German Republic, not complete sovereignty, of course, but the acts which it performs are in a technical and an actual sense acts of sovereignty.

From the beginning it may be said that there have been two theories in this country with reference to the action of our Government respecting European problems which became acute at the end of the war. There have been some who believe that it is the traditional policy of the United States to refrain from participation in European affairs. They insist that this Government and her people should leave the nations of Europe to settle their own disputes, to adjust without assistance from us their own great problems. There are others who, from the signing of the armistice, have held to the theory that our duty, as one of the associated powers engaged in the conduct of the war which resulted in victory for the Allies, our duty to our own interest, and respect for every consideration which should govern the United States in the conduct of its foreign affairs, justified, if it did not require, this Government to engage in an effort to assist them in settling their disputes in order that the victory which cost so much in blood and treasure might not be rendered fruitless.

It would not be profitable in this discussion to review the controversy between the representatives of those two viewpoints. The Government apparently adopted the policy of standing aloof. At the same time, so important was the business of the Reparation Commission, not only to Europe, but as its work reflected itself upon our affairs and our life, that President Harding, denied the opportunity under the treaty of peace with Germany to appoint an official representative, continued in service the very able unofficial organization with, I believe, some material changes in the personnel. It will be recalled that in his letter to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] dated December 27, 1922, when the so-called Borah amendment to the naval appropriation bill was under consideration by the Senate, the President used this language:

In ratifying the treaty of peace with Germany the Senate made a reservation that the United States should not be represented on the Reparation Commission without consent of the Congress and no such consent has been given—

And so forth. This was an implied suggestion, although not a direct recommendation, that the consent of Congress should be given.

From the beginning it has been manifest to some Senators that if the United States is to perform an effective service in solving her own problems as the same are related to economic and political conditions in Europe we must participate in the studies and work of the Reparation Commission. Evidently the President takes that view of the matter. Denied by the treaty with Germany the power to appoint an official representative, he resorts to the expedient of appointing an unofficial representative. I shall not now attempt to go into the manner in which our unofficial delegate on the Reparation Commission has performed his duty. My information is very limited. The channels of information available for my study are very narrow. I do feel justified in saying that it appears from all that has come to my knowledge that exceptional intelligence and rare good judgment have usually been exercised by the unofficial delegation serving as representatives of the United States on the Reparation Commission.

The fact that it has been found necessary to have unofficial representation, the fact that some of our unofficial agents are serving on the most powerful and influential bodies of the Reparation Commission, the fact that they have participated in some of the important decisions of the commission, lead me to wonder why anybody who thinks we ought to have representation at all questions the wisdom and the fairness of having there men expressly authorized to perform their duties. I know that the only answer can be that we are afraid; but if we go in at all, if we are to render assistance at all, why should we not do it through the agency of men who are authorized to represent the Government?

No one has suggested that the unofficial representation be withdrawn. Through two long years of as troublesome a period as the world ever knew, save only that period which closed when the armistice was signed, these unofficial agents of the Government, known throughout the world as actually representing this Nation, hampered and restricted, discredited and belittled by being denied official standing, have performed service of substantially the same nature as that performed by the representatives of other governments on the body with which they serve. Whether as the result of propaganda or the awakened conscience of the people of the Nation from the acquisition of knowledge concerning the facts, there is in progress a change of sentiment in this Republic. Men who heretofore have believed in the policy of aloofness are coming to the conviction that if that policy be continued revolution will engulf some, if not many, of the nations of Europe.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the question of our representatives on the commission, will the Senator tell us out of what appropriation the unofficial representatives are paid?

Mr. ROBINSON. They are paid by the Reparation Commission. This Government, refusing to appoint official representatives, has actually put its unofficial representatives in the position of receiving their compensation through the body to which we have refused to accredit them. The American unofficial delegation are paid just as are all the other delegations.

Mr. LODGE. They are all paid by Germany.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; they are all paid by Germany. In justice to the great German Republic, whose money we take to pay our servants, we ought to give those servants official recognition. If we are not going to do that, what course shall we pursue?

It has been said to me this morning that the only result of the action contemplated by this bill would be to involve us in the controversies of Europe, and that as a reward for our efforts we shall experience only censure and shall suffer financial loss. To that I reply that every nation in the world knows that for every hour the Reparation Commission has been in existence this Government has had a hand in its work though we have had no official representative. What pride can be taken by any American citizen in a continuance of such an arrangement? Why not have the courage to do our duty in a way that commands respect?

Something has been said about the creation of an unofficial board of inquiry. The Secretary of State in an address recently delivered at New Haven recognized the close relation of these European problems to the welfare of the people of the United States in this language:

We can not dispose of these problems by calling them European, for they are world problems; and we can not escape the injuries of a failure to settle them.

Then he said:

The crux of the European situation lies in the settlement of reparations.

That is almost a literal quotation from an address delivered by that great American economist and publicist, Mr. B. M. Baruch, at the reunion of the members of the War Industries Board held at Washington, D. C., on December 10, 1920. In the address I have just mentioned Mr. Baruch used this language:

Hence it is not too much to say, as I do say, that the crux of the world industrial and commercial problem lies in the fixing of the reparations that Germany must pay. The Allies must eventually come to see this, for they are under heavy burdens and are looking to the German reparations for their own rehabilitation. Germany must work to produce the wealth with which to pay the reparations. In helping herself she will do what is more important, she will be helping us all. Until central Europe is again going full speed ahead the rest of the world will lag. They may not like it, but that is the cold-blooded fact. The question of the interindebtedness of the Allies and even the sane rehabilitation of our own taxation can not be disposed of until the world is again humming with industry and every route and channel of commerce is reopened.

The Secretary of State announced no new position when he made the declaration that the reduction of reparations to an amount that Germany can pay is the crux of the economic and political problems that now vex Europe.

The Secretary of State in his New Haven address suggested a remedy as possible which is somewhat indefinite; it is not very specific. He said:

There ought to be a way for statesmen to agree upon what Germany can pay, for no matter what claims may be made against her, that is the limit of satisfaction. There ought to be a way to determine that limit and to provide a financial plan by which immediate results can be obtained and the European nations can feel that the foundation has been laid for their mutual and earnest endeavors to bring about the utmost prosperity to which the industry of their people entitles them. If statesmen can not agree and exigencies of public opinion make their course difficult, then there should be called to their aid those who can point the way to a solution. Why should they not invite men of the highest authority in finance in their respective countries, men of such prestige, experience, and honor that their agreement upon the amount to be paid and upon a fiscal plan for working out the payments would be accepted throughout the world as the most authoritative expression obtainable?

The Secretary of State impliedly says that if the Reparation Commission, the official body organized by the powers to determine this question, and the premiers of the respective nations whose interests are involved fail, then a body of business men, private citizens of the great governments of the earth, including our own, can volunteer or be selected, and that these private citizens will have such authority and such moral force throughout the world that mankind will immediately accept, or be disposed to accept, their findings as conclusive evidence of the amount of reparations that Germany should pay. The question is not intimately related to the bill I am discussing, and, therefore, I shall not go into detail in the discussion of the proposed board of inquiry. The selection of a board of inquiry, it may be borne in mind, would occasion indefinite delay. That board would either be compelled to accept the work already done by the Reparation Commission and the committee on guaranties, or it would be compelled to duplicate the work done by them, and the inevitable result would be that final adjustment would be postponed. The clouds that seem to be gathering above the horizon would grow blacker and blacker until they would merge with the shadows of night.

It has been said that Germany is on the verge of collapse; that she will not and can not maintain herself unless the reparations problem be settled and the aggregate amount be readjusted so as to enable her to find a way to meet her obligations.

The conference in Paris between the premiers of the French Government and of the British Government has disclosed the fact that they are not widely apart respecting the aggregate amount of reparations; and it is singular to note that the amount they propose, after two years of wrangling and bickering amongst the representatives of the governments involved, is almost exactly the amount which Bernard M. Baruch said two years ago was the maximum sum which Germany could pay. We are making no progress.

The morning press contains the statement that some Senators on the other side of the Chamber propose to support this bill, provided the nations of Europe in the meantime settle the question of reparation. Well, if that question is settled I will not be found in the Senate of the United States urging the authorization of an official representative of this Government to help settle it.

I have believed from the beginning that by the force of circumstances, from a prompt consideration of our own interests, and from a sense of justice not only to France and Poland but also to the great German Republic the United States would in time be driven to give her open and well-considered counsel to those who have tried in vain without our advice to settle this great problem. After two years, however, we are still hesitating to act officially, though we are acting unofficially, and have been throughout that period.

Our commerce and industry are suffering by reason of the political distraction and financial panic which threaten almost every government in Europe. An able, learned gentleman said to me this morning that this Nation is now more prosperous than ever before in its history and that no excuse or justification exists for changing the policy which marks the present conduct of our foreign relations. Let me call to your attention, Mr. President, the fact, stated in an editorial of the New York World under date of December 18, 1922, when it points out that, notwithstanding the present excessive price of merchandise, the value of the money crops of America is less than it was in 1914.

The editorial says:

> This year's wheat crop alone is worth actually less than that of 1914; it is worth only 31 per cent more than that of 1909, in the days before the war had overturned all precedents. Thus the total of wheat value has little more than kept pace with the growth of population. Its increase bears no relation whatever to prices for merchandise in general, which are far higher than they were 13 years ago.
> This is what has happened to the farmer: The price of his chief money crops—wheat, cotton, meat—is fixed in international markets, where he has been accustomed to sell his surplus. These markets are failing him and he is selling at cut rates, while everything he buys, including labor and the interest on his investment, if his farm was bought or improved at recent prices, is costing him double. As a rule, he is not coming out even. He is trenching upon his savings to pay living expenses, if he has any savings available for the purpose; if he has no such savings, as in the case of many renters, his condition calls for lively sympathy no more than for swift relief.

If Germany experiences complete collapse, as many fear she may, our foreign market will be further diminished, if not destroyed, and in all probability the prices of agricultural products will still further decline. I think the Senator from Idaho was right when he said, in substance, during the debates on his amendment proposed to the naval appropriation bill, that the time has arrived when the people of the United States, from considerations of their own self-interest, should render effective and prompt service toward the settlement of the economic and the political disputes that make it impossible for men of brains and genius to take ventures in commerce and in trade so long as these disputes continue.

That Germany is approaching a collapse is apparent. The great Republic, which has arisen above the ruins of the former German Empire—a Republic whose people seek an opportunity to live and labor in peace—must not remain forever an outcast among the nations. The opportunity of assisting to lead the new German nation to a plane of permanent safety while at the same time advancing the happiness and prosperity of our own people is worthy of our united and wholehearted efforts.

Both hesitation and secrecy should be abandoned. Let the Senate and the public be informed as to what has been done and what this Government proposes to do to save us from the harm which must inevitably come if present political and economic disturbances in Europe continue. The responsibility of conducting foreign affairs must not be left to bankers, merchants, and bond brokers in their private capacities. It must primarily devolve upon the Chief Executive. The issues to be met are governmental. Therefore the power that should grapple with them is not private responsibility but public authority.

Mr. President, while I have been speaking there has been sent to me from the press gallery a news report which I accept as authentic:

> PARIS, January 4.—The allied premiers' conference ended to-day in complete disagreement.
>
> Failure of the entente that won the war to agree upon a joint method of collecting the spoils from Germany brought the latest European economic parley to an end.
> Britain and France were unalterably opposed in their stands as to how the reparations payments should be collected.

So the great problem continues. Difficulties are augmented. This Nation may or may not be able to accomplish a settlement and bring back peace to the world; but it has the opportunity and the enterprise, and its possibilities are worth the risk and the endeavor. Certainly the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate should obtain for itself and furnish the Members of this body all the information available affecting the problem which underlies the provisions of this bill.

I have some information, through the courtesy of the chairman of the committee, that the subject will be promptly investigated. I think that the Secretary of State and Mr. Henry B. Hodge and Mr. Lloyd Robbins, one or both of them, who are serving in connection with our unofficial delegation on the Reparation Commission, who are somewhat familiar with the work that has been done and the tasks that are yet to be performed, should be called before the committee and questioned fully. I think it might be well to invite our ambassador to the Court of St. James to give his views. I have been informed that there are on file in the State Department a number of documents and reports which will be very enlightening and of great value to the committee in its deliberations, should it see fit to take up the matter. This suggestion is made in the hope that the Senate will not be compelled to continue in a state of benighted darkness respecting available information relating to these great problems.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I very fully appreciate the importance of the bill which the Senator from Arkansas has presented, and which will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have already called a meeting of that committee for to-morrow morning. I can assure the Senator and the Senate that the gravity of the situation is understood by all the members of the committee certainly, as by the Senate generally, and that we shall seek all possible information on anything that can be of assistance in dealing with the very great questions involved in this bill. I can assure the Senator and the Senate, further, that this will be done without delay.

I am going to say one word, not about the large and present subjects which the Senator from Arkansas has been discussing so ably, but with reference to what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] spoke of as academic—the constitutional method of dealing with foreign relations.

I do not think that there really is or ought to be any confusion in regard to it. The conduct of our foreign relations, the conduct of negotiations, must of necessity remain in the hands of the Executive, where the Constitution leaves it. As I said the other day, it is entirely open to the Senate, if it sees fit, to offer advice to the President, pending or even prior to a negotiation, and it is equally within his power to accept this advice or not, precisely as he pleases, in regard to the performance of the Executive function. In the same way, when the treaty or the convention, whatever it may be, passes into the power of the Senate, it is of course entirely open to the President to make any suggestion to the Senate that he may desire or that he thinks it proper to make, and it is within the power of the Senate to follow that advice and be guided by it or not, exactly as they please.

I do not think myself that there is anything which invades the Executive power in the provision in the German treaty which has been read here. When a treaty comes within the power of the Senate it is recognized that the Senate can accept, can reject, or can accept with reservations or with amendments, as it sees fit; and if it chooses to establish a condition as to a commission created by treaty, that power of reservation or amendment must rest in its hands. The power of the President to carry on all negotiations and initiate them all is absolute and he can use his own personal agents for that purpose if he chooses. The Constitution reserves to the Senate the right to confirm the appointment of ministers and ambassadors, and to extend that to commissioners created by treaty does not seem to me going far, as they are officers normally of less importance than ambassadors and ministers recognized by the Constitution. That, however, does not debar the President from choosing a personal agent for the purposes of negotiation if he chooses to do so. Most of our treaties have been negotiated by our Secretaries of State or by our ambassadors and ministers delegated for that purpose by the President, but the President can select if he prefers some citizen of the United States holding no official office whatever and direct him to conduct negotiation and to make a treaty. This use of personal agents until late years has been but very little indulged in. From the very beginning the Presidents have employed personal agents but rarely. There was a very famous case, that of Ambrose Dudley Mann, who was sent to Hungary by Mr. Fillmore at the time of the uprising there; but, on the whole, that method has been but slightly employed. Of late it has been more the fashion for Presidents to select personal agents; and, in my judgment, nothing can take away from the President under the Constitution the power to operate through a personal agent if he sees fit any more than there can be taken from the Senate the power to assent or disagree to the selection of an ambassador or a minister.

Mr. President, under the treaty with Germany, whether this academic question is decided one way or the other, there is no doubt of the law established by that treaty, and that is that if we are to be represented officially on the Reparation Commission it will require the action of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me, it will require the action of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the Senator is right. It will require the action of Congress. It will require an act of Congress, as the Senator has provided.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; it will require an act.

Mr. LODGE. That is more unusual in practice than putting in simply the right of the Senate to confirm a given officer. At all events, this act raises a question, and a most important one, as I have already said, and I only desire to repeat what I began by saying that I fully appreciate the great importance of the question at this moment, especially in view of the dispatch which has been read here as to the break between the prime ministers of the principal powers on the question of reparations. The Committee on Foreign Relations will give it most immediate attention, and I shall endeavor to get all the information possible for the benefit of the committee and of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the question that is submitted by the bill is by no means a new one, but at various times during different discussions of matters relating to our foreign affairs it has been more or less before us in the Senate and more or less before the Congress and more or less before our people. I have listened with the utmost interest, as usual, to the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. He is always entertaining, always logical, always eloquent, and to-day his address has been strikingly so.

I must say, Mr. President, in the light of the information that is now at hand, without developments, indeed, of which at the present we know nothing, I am compelled to enter an emphatic dissent to the design the Senator seeks to accomplish. I recognize, of course, what he says about this country's unofficial observer in the Reparation Commission, but I recognize, too, that that sort of activity is a prerogative of the President, with which we of the Senate have nothing to do and which we of the Senate can not at all control.

There is something, however, which we may control, something which lies within our province, and that is the selection of an official representative on the Reparation Commission, and because of what this country might be compelled ultimately to do I repeat that as at present advised I would not wish that we have any official representative there at all.

There is a great deal of loose talk all over the Nation to-day, just as we have had that loose talk during the past two years, about "stabilizing Europe," "throwing in our fortunes with the rest of the world," "doing our duty to all humanity," "aiding civilization," and the like. That appeal, of course, we all understand, and the appeal, of course, is one which touches us all; but in all of the talk thus indulged scarce anybody points a way, and there is nothing definite that thus far has been suggested upon this floor so far as I am aware, nothing that has been suggested thus far in the country, whereby we can stabilize Europe and aid the rest of the world, prevent a collapse in Germany, or do our duty unto mankind, as gentlemen constantly are asserting we ought to do.

There is no such mistake about our duty in the minds of our English brethren, no such mistake as to the duty we ought to perform in the minds of some of those who have dealt with the question. I have before me a recent edition of the Manchester Guardian, wherein very plainly is pointed out exactly what this country can do, and the only thing it can do, to do its duty toward civilization, aid mankind, stabilize Europe, and perform all the other altruistic things that every one of us would perform and have our country perform.

I read from an editorial in the Manchester Guardian of December 22:

> But until America is prepared to release Europe from a great part of her debts, American "intervention" must be confined to good advice. Advice, unfortunately, will not stabilize the mark or fill a hole in the French budget.

There is the thing we could do. Do you want to do it? Europe owes us $12,000,000,000 or more to-day. We can aid Europe if we want to. If this is not empty talk in which we indulge in this country to-day, we are told there is a way in which we can play our part in this economic intervention of which so much has been said. We can play our part if you are ready to do it by forgiving the debt that Europe owes unto us. I am not ready to do it, but these gentlemen here who talk of what we ought to do for Europe have one definite, specific, concrete mode in which they can render aid. Are you ready to render that aid? I say that it will be an injustice unto our people, an injustice unto our Government. But there is the road. Will you take it—dare you take it—or will you continue to indulge in the same nebulous expressions that have been indulged in in this Chamber and that are being written all over this land?

As the London Times said in a recent editorial, do you want to indulge a mere gesture, and a ridiculous gesture at that, or are you ready to go the route and play your part as they want you to play your part? That is the question, and it will not be for us constantly to indulge in the phrases that are common now all over the land. There is the road. Take it if you dare. Some of us will not take it with you, because we think it unjust; but it is the only feasible, concrete thing to do if you want to stop talking in mysterious and nebulous phrases and render the aid.

Let us look at this bill a bit further. It seeks to place us upon the Reparation Commission. Recently I endeavored to describe that Reparation Commission. All here, I think, understand now exactly what it is; that it is, indeed, a supergovernment, with its various powers, political in character, executive in character, sovereign in character, as the Senator from Arkansas has said.

We would not go upon that Reparation Commission for the purpose of settling the amount of the reparations now, Mr. President. The amount of reparations is in little dispute to-day. The amount of reparations was practically conceded by the Premiers of Great Britain and France in the conference that has just been ended in this hour. They agreed upon practically a definite, specific sum, so that it would not take an American representative upon the Reparation Commission to agree upon a sum of reparations, for there is little disagreement concerning that, and a fact-finding commission, such as was suggested by the Secretary of State a few nights ago, would be of very little avail to-day.

Your representative upon the Reparation Commission would have a larger and a much more important duty to perform. He would have the duty to perform officially, under the authority of the United States Government, of being part of a sovereign power, directing, managing, operating, and conducting the affairs of the territory over which the Reparation Commission rules; directing political and legislative operations and activities of the governments over which the Reparation Commission rules, going into a realm far, far removed from that which deals with amounts, or that which deals with finances at all.

When you go into that realm, with your associates, you go into a realm which necessarily may lead into the question of military occupation in a part of Europe. Are you ready to go that far, and take this country again into military occupation of any part of Europe, if default be made in the reparations payments? If you are, I am not; and as time goes on, I believe, notwithstanding the propaganda in this country, notwithstanding all that has been said during the past few months by various newspapers and various individuals and organizations concerning helping Europe, you will find that this country will not go into any plan, any scheme, any commission, under which ultimately military occupation may be had, and under the government of which commission, plan, or scheme we may be required to do our part in the military occupation of any portion of the Continent of Europe.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator says that if this country should have an official representative on the Reparation Commission it may have to use military force. Is it not so, in the opinion of the Senator, and inevitably so, that if we shall be officially represented on that commmission we will be absolutely bound to enforce whatever decrees and orders the commission may make?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And use whatever means are necessary to do that?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think there is any question about that. I suggested the contingency instead of the actual fact, because of the possibility that the reparations might be paid as directed to be paid, and that military sanctions might not be required. That was the only reason for the suggestion in the form in which I made it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator is on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and was on that committee when the treaty of peace was ratified. In the ratification resolution it was stated:

> The United States shall not be represented or participate in any body, agency, or commission, nor shall any person represent the United States as a member of any body—

And so forth. As I construe that language, it seems that it was intended by the committee and by the Senate, when it ratified the treaty, that we were not to be represented on this commission or any commission, directly or indirectly, until there was an act of Congress, and I think it was so argued here in this body. Is the Senator in favor of our continuing to be unofficially represented on the Reparation Commission, and if he is in favor of our being unofficially represented on that commission, are we not just as much morally bound by our unofficial representation as we would be if we were officially represented?

Mr. JOHNSON. The 17 questions which have been asked by the Senator I will try to answer. As to the last, no; we are not morally bound, nor are we legally bound. As to the earlier part of the Senator's question, if I may recall it, I think the purpose of the proviso originally was to prevent representation on the Reparation Commission or participation in its deliberations. I speak only one voice in that regard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Official and unofficial?

Mr. JOHNSON. I speak only one voice in that regard, I say. I am not attempting to say what was in the minds of my colleagues in that respect, but I state only what was in my mind. I am not attempting to justify what has happened upon the Reparation Commission. Make no mistake as to that at all. I say that is a prerogative of the President, and I can not help it; but because of the wording of that treaty, I can help in keeping this country from going into the Reparation Commission and binding the United States of America, and it is that that I will prevent, if I can, by my vote in the Senate. That is the attitude I assume.

Let me refer to another editorial in the Manchester Guardian, because I want to bring home to Senators the concrete thing that may be done in relation to aiding Europe, and then when the discussion may come upon this question I want Senators to say whether they are ready to do the concrete thing.

> Here we get onto the very delicate question of interallied debts. But it is no use burking it. The fact has got to be faced that in the long run debts, like reparations, will have to be scaled down and the two treated together in a common plan. None of the messages from America suggests the faintest dawning of this truth in the mind of the American public, and it may be said that in its turn the American Government would not be politically strong enough, even if it were so minded, to accept a reparations settlement which involved the cancellation of the American debt.

There is what is in the minds of our brethren abroad—the American debt. There is what ought to be in our minds if we are going to talk about doing something concrete and definite for Europe, instead of in this hazy fashion in which somewhere men mount the clouds and are sitting far up above the rest of us, with an assumed superior wisdom looking down upon the rest of us because we want to deal with concrete things and deal with the situations as we find them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that either the forgiveness of the debt or its cancellation is a somewhat euphemistic way of stating that it is to be imposed upon our own citizens instead of upon those who benefited by it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of necessity so, and that is exactly what I was coming to. Oh, the stuff that has been indulged in about the aid that is to be given to the farmer by holding conferences and the like. Hold a conference, Mr. President, and the next instant wheat will increase 100 per cent in price. Some farmers actually profess to believe it. "Aid Europe economically," they say. Nobody says how. "Economic intervention." Nobody explains what it is. Have economic intervention and aid Europe economically, and every farmer in the West will have the price of every product he raises increased 1,700 per cent. That sort of thing has gone abroad in the country to-day to the detriment of our own people, to the arousing of false hope abroad. The concrete thing is just what the English papers said. The debt that is due to this country—cancel it, they say; but who then pays it? Why, the farmers will pay the bill, the farmers will pay the debt. These fanciful flights at the end mean cancellation of what is our due—putting the burden wholly upon our own people.

Please do not think because I am speaking as I do that I am lacking in a desire to aid Europe in solving her problems. Everything that could be done, that might be done, in justice to our own people I am willing to do. I am not ready to cancel the debt that is due to America. I am not ready yet to saddle that $12,000,000,000 upon American citizens. I am not ready yet to take us into any pact, to take us into any reparation commission, where we might be called upon for military sanctions in the future or to police any part of the European continent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator said with great emphasis that he is not willing that this Government shall have representation on the Reparation Commission because he thinks that would involve the cancellation or forgiveness of the debts which certain Governments of Europe owe the United States. Does the Senator think the Reparation Commission has or would assume jurisdiction of that question?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is mistaken entirely in his statement. Either I expressed myself very inadequately or the Senator misunderstood me. I do not say that entering upon the Reparation Commission would cancel our debt at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; I did not understand the Senator to say that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the Senator to say that he understood me to so state.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood the Senator to say that if we had representation upon the Reparation Commission the Governments of Europe would insist upon our representatives there canceling or consenting to the cancellation of the debts which those Governments owe us.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. That that was the only thing we could do.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has said we can not have, from his viewpoint, representation upon the Reparation Commission and we should not engage in any conference looking toward our assisting in bringing about a settlement of those questions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not say that either. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator did ridicule the idea of an economic conference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. And said it would accomplish nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I did.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has also said that he is anxious to do anything that can be done of a practical nature to help. What does the Senator think can be done?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know what can not be done. I am perfectly clear as to that. Our good offices I would use. I would aid in any advice that I could. In any fashion that it would be possible without involving our country or committing us, I would endeavor to be of service. I would not enter into political commitments at all, nor in any fashion involve us in the malestrom of European politics.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has accused some of us who have favored the representation of the United States on the Reparation Commission of indefiniteness and generalities. Does not the Senator think his reply to my question as to what remedy he proposes or what action he thinks this Government should take, if any, in connection with the problems and troubles of Europe, is subject to the same criticism?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I do. I plead guilty. But the difference between us is this: I am taking us into nothing harmful. The Senator is taking us into something which I believe would be harmful. That is the difference between us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not mean to say that he is at all satisfied with the present condition of things?

Mr. JOHNSON. The present condition of what things?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of economic conditions in Europe.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course I am not at all. I never would be satisfied indeed until everybody was happy and everybody was wealthy. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. FRENCH, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and Mr. OLIVER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 13481. A bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13559. A bill making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13593. A bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

SENATOR FROM MISSOURI.

Mr. SPENCER. I present the certificate of election of my colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri, as United States Senator for a term of six years commencing on March 4 next. I ask that it be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF MISSOURI,
Executive Department.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1922, JAMES A. REED was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Missouri a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1923.

In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Missouri. Done at the city of Jefferson this 22d day of December, A. D. 1922.

[SEAL.] ARTHUR M. HYDE.

By the governor:

CHARLES U. BECKER,
Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present the credentials of my colleague, Mr. TRAMMELL, and ask that they may be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1922, PARK TRAMMELL was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Florida a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1923.

Witness: His excellency, our governor, Cary A. Hardee, and our seal hereto affixed at Tallahassee this the 27th day of December, 1922, in the year of our Lord 1922.

[SEAL.] CARY A. HARDEE, Governor.

By the governor, attest:

H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM NEW JERSEY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the credentials of EDWARD I. EDWARDS, chosen a Senator of the United States from the State of New Jersey, which were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

I, EDWARD I. EDWARDS, Governor of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that at an election held in the said State on the 7th day of November, 1922, EDWARD I. EDWARDS was duly chosen and elected by the people of the said State of New Jersey to be a Member of the United States Senate for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1923.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of New Jersey to be hereunto affixed at Trenton this 5th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1922, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-seventh.

[SEAL.] E. I. EDWARDS.

By the governor:

THOS. F. MARTIN,
Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. BALL presented the credentials of THOMAS F. BAYARD, chosen a Senator of the United States from the State of Delaware, which were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

BY AUTHORITY OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

Be it known an election was held in the State of Delaware on Tuesday, the 7th day of November, A. D. 1922, that being the Tuesday next after the first Monday in said month, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Delaware, in that behalf, for the election of a Senator for the people of the said State in the Senate of the United States.

Whereas the official certificates or returns of the said election, held in the several counties of the said State, in due manner made out, signed, and executed, have been delivered to me according to the laws of the said State by the superior court of the said counties; and having examined said returns and enumerated and ascertained the number of votes for each and every candidate or person voted for for such Senator, I have found THOMAS F. BAYARD to be the person highest in vote and therefore duly elected Senator of and for the said State in the Senate of the United States for the constitutional term to commence on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1923.

I, William D. Denney, governor, do therefore, according to the form of the act of the general assembly of the said State and of the act of Congress of the United States, in such case made and provided, declare the said THOMAS F. BAYARD the person highest in vote at the election aforesaid and therefore duly and legally elected Senator of and for the said State of Delaware in the Senate of the United States for the constitutional term to commence on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1923.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the said State, in obedience to the said act of the general assembly and of the said act of Congress, at Dover the 15th day of November, A. D. 1922, and in the year of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-seventh.

[SEAL.] WM. D. DENNEY.

By the governor:

A. R. BENSON,
Secretary of State.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4050) to provide for the purchase and sale of farm products.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, resuming my account of the transactions of the Shipping Board during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, I desire to say that it was the opinion of the board that the tramp service was not of fundamental benefit in developing a merchant marine, and it was decided to concentrate its efforts on regular trade routes deemed essential to the future of the American merchant marine. Despite the continued decline in freight rates the corporation instituted between New York and London another line of combination passenger and freight steamers, with weekly sailings, superior to any foreign line from any North Atlantic port and offering sufficient space for perishable cargo in refrigerated chambers. New freight services were established. Offices were set up at various interior points to acquaint the public with Shipping Board lines in world trade routes, sailing dates, rates, and so forth.

The corporation secured an agreement with shippers of Egyptian cotton by which half of the quantity intended for shipment to the United States would be carried in board vessels. British ships had been carrying all the cotton shipments from Egypt to the United States.

Dependable sailing schedules were maintained to a greater degree than ever before during the fiscal year now being considered.

The 23 combination passenger and cargo vessels constructed by the corporation were delivered during the year and assigned as follows: Seven to operate in the service between New York, Cherbourg, and London; four between New York, Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires; five between San Francisco, Honolulu, Yokohama, Kobe, Shanghai, Manila, and Hongkong; five between Seattle, Yokohama, Shanghai, Hongkong, and Manila; two were being reconditioned when the fiscal year closed.

Five more ex-German ships were put in service during the year. Sailing time to Rio was shortened to 12 days, to Buenos Aires to 17 days, a saving of six to eight days over former schedules. Sailing time to the Orient was exceptionally good from Puget Sound, that to Yokohama being 12 days, Kobe 14 days, Shanghai 17 days, Hongkong 21 days, Manila 25 days. Fortnightly sailings were maintained on nearly all the principal world routes, with weekly sailings to prominent European ports. Definite schedules were established in many cargo services, a monthly freight service being operated from the Pacific coast to Australia. For this service there were six board vessels operated as feeders between Shanghai, Hongkong, and Calcutta, and four for the Seattle service between Hongkong and Java ports.

Shipping Board vessels handled 10,948,294 cargo tons during the year—6,634,381 representing exports and 4,313,913 representing imports. This was nearly 14 per cent of the cargo tonnage handled by all American vessels. Nearly 39 per cent was handled by American ships privately owned. So about 52 per cent of our foreign trade in quantity was handled by the American merchant marine during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922. The percentage in value was nearly 35 per cent. The remainder of the trade was carried in foreign ships. Our total seagoing merchant marine, in both Shipping Board and private ownership, while it comprised fewer ships on June 30, 1922, than a year earlier, had a ship tonnage of 13,351,295, as against 13,234,401 a year earlier. This was the largest seagoing tonnage ever assembled under the flag, representing larger and better ships than ever before, and yet they talk of subsidy!

On June 30, 1921, the laid-up steel fleet comprised 690 vessels, at an upkeep cost per vessel of $1,019.42 per month. Reduction of employees and wages lowered the cost per vessel per month to $300.62 on June 30, 1922, at which time the laid-up steel fleet had increased to 971 vessels. During the fiscal year the laid-up fleets were carefully surveyed and classified as to adaptability to service and physical condition, so that vessels in lay up could be intelligently substituted, whenever necessary, for those previously engaged in active service. The impression, therefore, that the enormous expenditures required for the construction of this great fleet represent almost total waste and loss is a stupendous error.

On June 30, 1921, the number of wood and composite ships in lay up was 275, and the annual expense per vessel averaged $919.65, or $76.64 per month. During the year some of these were disposed of and expense of maintenance reduced for the remainder. The number on hand June 30, 1922, was 236, and the average annual cost of maintenance per vessel $173.79, or $14.66 per month.

The immense construction program of the board, which began in 1917, was finally ended with the delivery of Western World, a 13,000-ton passenger and cargo steel vessel, on May 9, 1922.

In the sixth annual report of the board—the report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922—it is stated that perhaps the most remarkable shipbuilding record during the construction of the great board fleet was that of the Great Lakes Engineering Works in building at its plant on the Great Lakes the steamship Cruel Keys, a 3,350-ton steel cargo vessel. Keel was laid July 11, 1918; vessel launched July 27, 1918, just 16 days later; completed ship delivered to board August 14, 1918, just 34 days after keel was laid. Close to this was the record of the New York Shipbuilding Corporation in building the steamship Tuckahoe, a 4,900-ton steel collier. Keel was laid April 8, 1918; vessel launched May 5, 1918, just 27 days later; completed ship delivered to board May 15, 1918, just 37 days after keel was laid. The Grays Harbor Motorship Corporation launched the wood ship Aberdeen on September 28, 1918 just 19 days after keel was laid, and delivered the completed ship October 6, 1918, just 27 days after keel laying.

By June 30, 1922, 11 of the 17 dry docks in contemplation had been completed, 5 were almost complete, while construction of one remained in suspense. The Fleet Corporation reported that during the year dry-dock construction was practically completed.

During the year the corporation consolidated all its fuel agencies into a fuel department, whose duties covered purchase and distribution of fuel oil and bunker coal; construction, maintenance, and operation of fuel-oil and bunker-coal stations.

The board's foreign organization continued to function during the year, rendering needed assistance to its ships in foreign trade along lines heretofore set out.

As we have seen, sales of all kinds were taken over by one of the vice presidents of the new and separate organization of the Fleet Corporation early in the fiscal year now under observation.

The new Shipping Board had, as the result of an examination at the beginning of the year, reached the conclusion that the price the preceding board was asking for steel cargo tonnage—that is, $160 to $185 per dead-weight ton—varied too widely from world market prices, and made a radical readjustment of prices. The board, in carrying out the policy of the act of 1920, for a privately owned and operated merchant marine as an ultimate ideal, and as a step to that end for the sale of the Government-owned ships as soon as practicable on terms consistent with good business judgment and the proper development of the American merchant marine, decided to establish a general basis of valuation for such sale. The board stated in its report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, that its object in establishing this basis was to fill demands for ship tonnage under the American flag from the Government-owned vessels, except in the few cases of very special service for which vessels of special design only could be used.

The board stated that the price for these Government vessels should be sufficiently below present cost of reproduction or probable cost of reproduction in the near future to cover depreciation, overcome preference of purchaser for particular requirements, and to compensate for any fault or inferiority of design due to war construction. The board stated that its study of the world's ship market indicated that a fair price for the best steel cargo tonnage would be about $30 per dead-weight ton; that this price was merely for the guidance of the board; that sales would be made on a lump-sum basis, "as is, where is," purchaser to make his own estimate as to dead-weight tonnage, condition, and so forth.

The board said further that but few ships could be sold at any price until legislation should make it possible for American operators to compete with foreign vessels; that if prices were established which would meet existing demand, sales in volume could be anticipated as soon as competitive operation could be established and the world's trade rehabilitated.

The board went on to say that in November, 1921, it had offered different types of vessels for sale but found that practically no market existed at the time.

The board then stated that while prices should be sufficiently low to cause shipowners to buy Government vessels rather than construct new ones, except for very special service, it would be neither good business nor justice to the taxpayer to establish a needlessly low level of prices; that a merchant marine built on a fleet obtained at prices that did not reasonably represent its value would give only temporary benefit based on an unstable foundation; that no permanent success could be built on a narrow margin of profit which would be changed to a loss when new vessels would have to be bought at market prices.

Here, it will be observed, the board condemns with unanswerable logic the idea of subsidy. The sale of vessels at prices below reasonable value is but a form of subsidy, and is denounced by the board as fatal to the sound and permanent development of a merchant marine.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would like to know from what report the Senator is reading? Is that a recent report made by the Shipping Board?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The report of the present Shipping Board for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, its last annual report.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Made by the board which is now advocating this bill, selling these ships for practically nothing, and giving a very large subsidy?

Mr. SHEPPARD. By the board which is now asking for a subsidy. How the board, after an expression like this, can consistently advocate the subsidy provisions of the pending bill—provisions calling for at least $450,000,000 in direct donations to shipowners during the next decade and a half, for loans exceeding a hundred millions on most generous terms—is beyond comprehension or belief.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator again read the expression of the board to which he refers?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I gave it a few moments ago, but I shall be glad to repeat it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The board said that while prices should be sufficiently low to cause shipowners to buy Government vessels rather than construct new ones, except for very special service, it would be neither good business nor justice to the taxpayer to establish a needlessly low level of prices; that a merchant marine built on a fleet obtained at prices that did not reasonably represent its value would give only temporary benefit based on an unstable foundation; that no permanent success could be built on a narrow margin of profit which would be changed to a loss when new vessels would have to be bought at market prices.

The Senator will realize that the sale at too low a price is as much a subsidy as a direct donation from the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator construes that statement as an argument against the principle of the subsidy?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It speaks for itself. It is one of the best statements I have ever seen of the reasons which should prompt Congress never to grant subsidies to private enterprises.

Continuing its discussion of a sales policy, the board in the report referred to stated further that it would establish a price scale advantageous to American purchaser and operator but still representing a fair value after considering all elements of the shipping problem; that this contemplated only steel vessels suitable to permanent incorporation in the American merchant marine; that vessels of unsuitable type for this purpose and exceeding in number any demand anticipated in a reasonable period were in a different class; that for a part of this surplus fleet there existed and would exist for many years a market under foreign flags; and that when these surplus ships could be clearly identified and designated prices would be fixed for sale to foreign flags.

The board added that there was no favorable prospect for the early disposal of the fleet; that even with needed legislation its transfer to private hands as a part of the upbuilding of the American merchant marine must be a slow process; that one of the most favorable factors in the gradual working out of the problem was the fact that a large percentage of the world's tonnage was over 15 years old and was approaching a period when cost of maintenance would make purchase of other tonnage preferable to upkeep of our vessels; that while a greater portion of foreign tonnage was approaching this point than was the case with American tonnage the difficulties of the present situation were largely caused by an excess of world tonnage, and that any absorption at home or abroad tended to remove this excess and establish higher values for all vessels; that the increase in value of vessels due to the demand in the next few years, resulting from the increasing age of the world's tonnage, would more than compensate for the cost of upkeep during the period that must elapse until the excess should disappear.

Such was the general shipping situation and the board's policy in reference thereto, as defined by the board on June 30, 1922. During the fiscal year ending on that date the board sold 59 steel ships, totaling 359,577 dead-weight tons, for $9,753,757, and 28 wooden and concrete ships, totaling 98,918 dead-weight tons, for $247,923. Twenty-one wooden ships had been sold on bids taken at the time the present board took office for $120,422.88. The board afterwards discovered that the wooden ships, while salable only at a very low price, could be used in certain trades in serious competition with established lines operating steel ships and with injurious effect upon the development of the American merchant marine. (See Sixth Annual Report United States Shipping Board, p. 194.)

The board sent a number of these wooden ships to shipyards for dismantling in order to determine their salvage value, evidently with a view to salvaging rather than selling them, thereby avoiding the dangerous competition they might offer steel vessels. So these despised wooden ships had no little efficiency after all. During the fiscal year 36 ships, all steel but 2, were transferred by Executive order to other Government departments without payment—ships that had probably cost $50,000,000 to build.

After sales and other disposals of all kinds and types of ships, finished or unfinished, that had come into the board's ownership, partial or complete, from all sources since the beginning, the total number being 3,444, totaling about 19,598,900 dead-weight tons, the board had in its possession on June 30, 1922, 1,686 vessels of 10,809,172 dead-weight tons, of the following kinds: 1,256 steel cargo ships of 8,537,675 dead-weight tons, 44 steel combined cargo and passenger ships of 506,807 dead-weight tons, 82 steel tankers of 751,086 dead-weight tons, 13 steel refrigerator ships of 91,183 dead-weight tons, 30 steel tugs, tonnage not given, 225 wooden cargo ships of 828,385 dead-weight tons, altogether 1,425 steel ships; 16 wooden harbor tugs, tonnage not given, altogether 241 wooden ships; 11 composite cargo ships of 39,175 dead-weight tons, 2 concrete cargo ships of 6,078 dead-weight tons, and 7 concrete tankers of 48,783 dead-weight tons.

As we have seen, this mighty merchant fleet, principally of steel, was in condition for gradual incorporation into a privately owned and operated merchant marine, that is, such as was not in actual use, represented the newest and largest volume of carrying tonnage in the word, whether in lay up or in use, was destined to grow in value as the rapidly aging tonnage of the world marine neared the point of inevitable replacement, had all of it in prosperous times found ready employment, was now for the most part in lay up on account of continuous and universal business depression—a condition affecting other merchant fleets as well as ours in lay up, but carefully guarded against deterioration at a cost of about $300 per month for steel ships and less than $15 per month for wooden ships—an expense offset by the growth in value due to world conditions already mentioned. To speak of this fleet as representing a total loss, or an approximately total loss, or the greatest commercial wreck of the ages, as some have done, is to ignore the facts.

Despite this superabundance of modern vessels, waiting for the return of prosperous activities on the seas, and despite the unparalleled progress of the American merchant marine since 1914—a progress from an almost negligible point to a foremost place in ocean trade, a progress marked by the handling of more than 50 per cent of our foreign trade tonnage every year since and including 1920—despite the fact that these hundreds of laid-up ships will accommodate the expansion of our foreign trade for years to come, a bill has been pending in Congress for several months, and has passed the House, providing cash subsidies involving at least 450 millions in the next decade and a half, and a loan fund of $125,000,000 for the construction of more ships.

Let us now consider that bill, the bill commonly known as the ship subsidy bill—the bill now under discussion in the Senate. In the event it becomes law it will also be known as the merchant marine act of 1922. The title reads that it is a bill to amend and supplement the merchant marine act of 1920, and for other purposes. As we have seen, the merchant marine act of 1920 amends and supplements the shipping act of 1916. It is necessary, therefore, to have all three measures before us in order to obtain a proper estimate of the situation confronting us. We have already reviewed the acts of 1916 and 1920 and intervening war shipping acts.

The bill now before us is divided into seven titles in addition to the general title already given. The first title is called "Amendments to the merchant marine act, 1920." Section 1 of this title amends section 5 of the act of 1920, the section authorizing and directing the board, as soon as practicable, to sell all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of the act of 1920 or otherwise acquired by the board by requiring that the interest on the unpaid purchase price shall be payable at least annually at a rate of not less than 4½ per cent per annum; that payments of principal be so arranged that the amounts due or paid under the contract of sale as principal up to any moment of time shall be sufficient to cover depreciation of the vessel up to such moment, unless the board waives this requirement on the giving of adequate security, provided that no employee of the Government shall in any way be interested as a vendee in any purchase made from the Shipping Board; that all sales made under this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 of the act of 1916, as amended, provided that the ship known as the Leviathan, now being reconditioned, shall not be sold for a price less than the cost for reconditioning said vessel. Section 1 of this title further amends section 5 of the act of 1920 by striking out certain requirements and safeguards in connection with the sale of vessels. This will be referred to later.

Section 2 of this title amends section 7 of the merchant marine act of 1920, the section relating to the establishment of routes by the board and the operation of ships thereon, by requiring that domestic communities primarily interested in such lines shall be understood to mean the geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States known as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, together with particular ports from which such lines may run or be intended to run and the territorial regions and zones naturally tributary to such ports and coastal divisions; that the board shall not for the period of two years after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, sell vessels operating on routes established by the board prior to the enactment of this act to persons other than those who, in the judgment of the board, have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines; that it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to discourage monopoly in the American merchant marine, and in pursuance of this policy the board is directed in the development of its sales and its assignment policy to continue as far as possible and practicable, subject to the provisions of this section, all existing steamship routes and regular services, and to endeavor in every way to bring about the permanent establishment of such routes and services and their retention, as far as possible, in the hands of persons having the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such routes and services; that in carrying out the provisions of this section the board is directed to investigate fully all matters in connection therewith and to conduct hearings at which the persons interested in such communities may have the opportunity to express their views as to the course to be pursued by the board and the methods to be adopted in carrying out the policy therein prescribed.

Sections 3 and 4 of this title reenact and amend sections 9 and 10 of the merchant marine act of 1920, sections relating to marine insurance, adding the provision that purchasers could take the necessary insurance with commercial concerns or with the separate insurance fund created by the board, and the further provision that private parties could utilize the separate fund only when foreign insurance companies were offering lower rates than the American companies.

Section 5 of this title amends and enlarges section 11 of the merchant marine act of 1920 by increasing the construction-loan fund from $25,000,000 to $125,000,000 and adding other provisions, so that the section as amended provides (a) that there is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund to be known as the "United States Shipping Board construction-loan fund"; that there shall be covered into such loan fund all moneys which at the time of the enactment of this act are in the fund created by section 11 of the act of 1920; that the board may set aside and cover into the loan fund all receipts of the board except appropriations made by law and profits of the board from the operations of vessels, but that the total amount of moneys covered into the loan fund, other than payments upon the principal and interest upon loans made therefrom, shall not exceed $125,000,000.

(b) That the board may use the loan fund to such extent as it deems necessary for making loans to aid persons, citizens of the United States, (1) in the construction by them of vessels in private shipyards of the United States of the best and most efficient type, equipped with the most efficient and the most economical machinery and commercial appliances, or (2) in the equipping by them of vessels already built with such machinery and commercial appliances, provided that this section shall not apply to construction or equipment of vessels by corporations or individuals primarily for the purpose of transporting their own products.

(c) That no loan shall be made for a longer time than 15 years; that all loans shall bear interest payable at least annually upon the unpaid principal at a rate not less than 4½ per cent per annum; that no loan shall be made (1) for construction purposes for a greater sum than two-thirds of the cost of the vessel to be constructed nor (2) for equipment purposes for a greater sum than two-thirds of the cost of the equipment or two-thirds of the value of the vessel when thus reequipped, whichever is the lesser; that the board shall require such security, including a first lien on the entire interest in the vessel, as it deems necessary in order to insure the repayment of the loan with interest; that in case of a loan under this section made after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, all payments on the principal and interest of the loan shall be covered into the loan fund.

Section 6 of this title amends section 24, merchant marine act, 1920, by adding the requirement that ships carrying mails must be such as are eligible for compensation under this act by repealing so much of section 7, act of 1920, authorizing mail-carrying contracts despite the act of March 3, 1891, and by repealing that act.

The second title is called "Taxation." The first seven sections under this title, amending the revenue act of 1921 by allowing certain income-tax exemptions as an encouragement for the construction of new ships or the saving of earnings for that purpose, were adopted by the House but were stricken out by the Senate Committee on Commerce and are no longer in the bill.

Then comes a section under this title numbered 201 in the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce and providing that Title II of the revenue act of 1921 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section numbered 272, and providing—

(a) That in case of vessels registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States the reasonable allowance for exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence provided in paragraph (8), subdivision (a), of section 214, and in paragraph (7), subdivision (a), section 234, of said revenue act, shall be determined and allocated to the years in which such depreciation was sustained under rules and regulations prescribed by the Shipping Board.

(b) That in case of a vessel of 1,000 gross tons or more acquired after August 1, 1914, and prior to January 1, 1921, there shall be allowed for the taxable year 1922 and each of the four succeeding taxable years, under rules prescribed by the board, a reasonable deduction for the exceptional decrease in value thereof since the date of acquisition, but not again including any amount otherwise allowed under this act or any previous act of Congress as a deduction in computing net income; that at any time before March 15, 1927, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, reexamine the return, and if he then finds as a result of an appraisal or from other evidence that the value on which the tentative deduction for exceptional decrease in value was based was incorrect or has changed, the income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes for the year or years affected shall be redetermined, and the amount of tax due on such redetermination, if any, shall be paid on notice and demand by the collector, and the amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with section 252 of said revenue act; that this section shall take effect as of January 1, 1922.

The next section, 202, excludes subsidy money received under this act from taxable income. Then follows section 203, doubling tonnage duties, tonnage taxes, or light money as to vessels eligible for subsidy.

The third title of the bill under debate is called "Transportation of Immigrants by Water."

The first section under this title, numbered as section 301, provides that, as nearly as practicable, one-half of the total number of immigrants admitted to the United States in any fiscal year shall be transported in vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States. The next section, 302, provides that the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall make regulations necessary for the enforcement of section 301 and that all such regulations relating to administration by diplomatic and consular officers of the United States shall be subject to approval of the Secretary of State. Section 303 provides that section 301 shall not take effect as to immigrants transported in a vessel documented under the laws of any foreign country until a time fixed by proclamation of the President, and that he is authorized and directed, whenever in his opinion this title is or may be in conflict with treaties, to take steps necessary to remove such conflict.

The fourth title is denominated "Compensation to Vessels of the United States." This is the part of the bill defining and conferring subsidy.

The first section under this title is numbered 401 and is a definition of terms. Section 402 provides that there is hereby established in the Treasury a fund to be known as the merchant marine fund, to the credit of which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to set aside the following sums paid into the Treasury after the enactment of the act:

(a) All tonnage duties, tonnage taxes, and light money.

(b) Ten per cent of the amount of all customs duties paid under law in force at time of enactment of this act or subsequently enacted.

(c) All excess earnings paid by the owner of any vessel under section 416 of this act.

Section 403 provides: (a) That in order to aid the development and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to promote the growth of the foreign commerce of the United States, to contribute to the national defense, and to carry out the policy set forth in section 1 of the merchant marine act, 1920, the board is authorized and directed on behalf of the United States to enter into a contract with any person, a citizen of the United States, who is the owner of a vessel for the payment of compensation in respect to such vessel, subject to the limitations of this title, if in the judgment of the board such person possesses such ability, experience, resources, and character as justify the belief that the payment of compensation will be reasonably calculated to carry out such policies and otherwise promote the general welfare of the United States, no contract to be refused on ground that the person is not so qualified unless after a public hearing such refusal is specifically authorized by affirmative vote of not less than five members of the board and the vote and full statement of reasons are spread upon the minutes of the board.

(b) That such contract shall provide that it shall be made for a period not exceeding 10 years from the date thereof and shall provide that payments of compensation shall be made at reasonable intervals not exceeding six months, provided that no contract made hereunder shall extend beyond a period of 15 years from the date of the enactment of this act.

(c) That the board shall not enter into any contract for the payment of compensation, or increase the rate of compensation fixed in any contract, unless it is satisfied that the amount payable under such contract in any fiscal year, plus the total amount payable in such year under other contracts for compensation, will not exceed the sum of $30,000,000.

(d) That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the merchant marine fund, compensation to the owner of any vessel contracted with, but such payment shall be made only on vouchers signed by the chairman of the board under authorization of the board; that all moneys in the merchant marine funds are hereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of making such payments and refunds subsequently authorized in this act.

Section 404 provides that compensation shall be computed as follows: For each gross ton of the vessel for each 100 nautical miles covered by the vessel there shall be paid—

(a) Regardless of the speed of which the vessel is capable, one-half of 1 cent; and

(b) In case of a power-driven vessel capable of making (when self-propelled solely by machinery) a speed of 12 knots or over when on such draft as the owner may select and in addition to any amount payable to such vessel under subdivision (a)—

(1) One-tenth of 1 cent, if such speed is 12 knots or over but less than 13 knots;

(2) Two-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 13 knots or over but less than 14 knots;

(3) Three-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 14 knots or over but less than 15 knots;

(4) Four-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 15 knots or over but less than 16 knots;

(5) Five-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 16 knots or over but less than 17 knots;

(6) Seven-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 17 knots or over but less than 18 knots;

(7) Nine-tenths of 1 cent, if such speed is 18 knots or over but less than 19 knots;

(8) One and one-tenth cents if such speed is 19 knots or over but less than 20 knots;

(9) One and three-tenths cents if such speed is 20 knots or over but less than 21 knots;

(10) One and five-tenths cents if such speed is 21 knots or over but less than 22 knots;

(11) One and eight-tenths cents if such speed is 22 knots or over but less than 23 knots; and

(12) Two and one-tenth cents if such speed is 23 knots or over.

Section 405 provides that for the purpose of computing compensation under the title—

(a) A vessel is held to be power driven if equipped so as to be self-propelled through use of machinery and if the rated horsepower of the propulsive machinery exceeds one-third the gross tonnage of the vessel;

(b) A vessel is held to be a sailing vessel if it is equipped so as to be self-propelled through use of sails and is not equipped so as to be self-propelled through use of machinery;

(c) Gross tonnage of vessel shall be as determined under laws of the United States and stated on vessel's certificate of admeasurement;

(d) The speed which a vessel is capable of making on such draft as owner may select shall be ascertained by the board at reasonable intervals and by such methods as it may by regulations prescribe;

(e) The mileage covered by the vessel shall be determined solely by distances of direct, customary route for vessels of same type and kind on similar voyages between the ports touched by the vessel based upon tables of such distances approved by the board, except that if such distances do not in the board's opinion fairly represent distances which under efficient operation are required actually to be traversed by the vessel on its voyage the board may increase the mileage to such an extent as it deems fair and reasonable, but in no case shall the mileage so increased exceed mileage actually traversed by the vessel;

(f) In computing mileage, a fractional part of 100 miles shall be disregarded, unless in excess of 50 miles, in which case it shall be counted as 100 miles.

(g) Any power-driven vessel of 5,000 gross tons or less but of 1,500 gross tons or over shall be considered as if it were a vessel of 5,000 tons.

Section 406 provides (a) that compensation shall not be paid in respect to any sailing vessel whose tonnage is less than 1,000 gross tons, nor to any other kind whose tonnage is less than 1,500 gross tons.

(b) That compensation shall be paid in respect to any vessel only for mileage covered while the vessel—

(1) Is a privately owned merchant vessel;

(2) Is registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States;

(3) Is self-propelled by sails or machinery, except when in distress or being aided by means of tugs or other assistance on entering or leaving port or in navigating any inland or restricted waterway;

(4) Is classed by the American Bureau of Shipping in the highest classification open to vessels of its type and kind according to the rules of the bureau; and

(5) Carries a crew (exclusive of licensed officers required by law) at least two-thirds of which are citizens of the United States and the remainder of which are individuals eligible to United States citizenship, the required number of United States citizens to be one-half instead of two-thirds during the first year after the enactment of this act and six-tenths instead of two-thirds during the second, the provisions of this paragraph to apply only to deck and engine departments in case of passenger vessels; owner and master of vessel not to be held to strict compliance with this paragraph in case of loss of any member of crew through desertion, casualty, or other cause beyond control in any port outside the United States where due diligence is shown; the owner of a vessel outside the United States at the enactment of this act or on the first day of the second or third year thereafter not to be required to comply with the provisions of this paragraph applicable to such year until her first arrival at a United States port if he complies with said provisions applicable to the previous year.

(c) That compensation shall not be paid in respect to any vessel unless the vessel (1) is registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States on the sixtieth day after the enactment of this act; or (2) is built in the United States, its Territories, or possessions, or the Canal Zone after the enactment of this act; or (3) is at the time of the enactment of this act undocumented and owned by a person, a citizen of the United States, and is not thereafter documented under the laws of any foreign country; or (4) is owned by the United States at the time of the enactment of this act and is not thereafter documented under the laws of any foreign country; or (5) was built in a foreign country before the enactment of this act and is within three years after the enactment of this act registered under the laws of the United States, compensation to be paid for such vessel only when specifically authorized on the affirmative vote of at least five members of the board to receive compensation and specifically certified to be essential to the proper development of the merchant marine of the United States by reason of the particular type or kind of vessel, such vote and a full statement of the reasons for such authorization and certification to be spread on the minutes of the board.

(d) That from total compensation earned in respect to any voyage there shall be deducted an amount bearing the same ratio thereto as the revenue attributable to the carriage of cargo owned by the owner of the vessel or any person affiliated with him within the meaning of subdivision (c), section 409, of this act relating to two or more affiliated corporations or associations bears to the total revenue attributable to the carriage of passengers, cargo, and mails, the amounts so attributable to be determined by the board as representing the fair value of services performed by the vessel in transporting such cargo.

Section 407 provides (a) that for purposes of compensation under this title a vessel shall be held to be engaged in foreign trade while operated on any voyage as a merchant vessel, with certain exceptions, namely, (b) that it shall not be held to be so engaged while carrying any passengers or cargo (1) which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in the United States, (2) which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in Alaska or Porto Rico, (3) which are taken on board at a port in Alaska or Porto Rico and discharged at a port in the United States, (4) which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in Hawaii or vice versa, if the revenue from such passengers and cargo amounts to more than one-fourth of the total revenue from all passengers and cargo on board at time of departure from last port of call in the United States or (5) Hawaii, as the case may be, or (6) which are taken on board at a port in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Virgin Islands, Philippine Islands, Canal Zone, and discharged at a port in the same Territory, possession, or zone.

(c) That the last-named restrictions shall not apply (1) to a voyage for carriage of passengers on a special or sight-seeing tour or for scientific purposes if the vessel does not, in the judgment of the board, carry passengers or cargo in competition with vessels in the coastwise trade, nor (2) to merchant vessels while operating as auxiliaries to the military or naval forces of the United States.

(d) That a vessel shall not be held to be in foreign trade while moving without passengers or cargo (1) between ports in the United States, unless the next carriage of passengers or cargo is to or from a port outside the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico; (2) between the United States and Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, unless the next carriage of passengers or cargo is to or from a port outside the United States and outside such Territory or possession; (3) between a port in Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico and a port in the same Territory or possession, unless the next carriage of passengers or cargo is to or from a port outside such Territory or possession and outside the United States; (4) between a port in the Virgin Islands, Philippine Islands, or Canal Zone and a port in the same possession or zone, unless the next carriage of passengers or cargo is to or from a port outside such possession or zone.

(e) That a vessel is not in foreign trade under this title while operating on the Great Lakes or adjacent or connecting waterways, unless the voyage begins or ends east of Quebec, Canada.

Section 408 provides (a) that compensation shall be paid in respect to any vessel only for mileage covered while the vessel is engaged in foreign trade upon a voyage of which one of the ports is a port of the United States, its Territories, or the Canal Zone, except that any vessel engaged in foreign trade shall be paid compensation for mileage covered in such trade during any period of time (1) if the vessel has entered or cleared from a port of the United States at any time during the 12 months prior to such period of time and after the making of the contract or (2) if the vessel during the six months ending with such period of time has derived at least one-half of the total revenue accruing to it by reason of the carriage of passengers or cargo from passengers and cargo received from or delivered to vessels which are registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States and whose voyage began or terminated at a port in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone.

(b) That compensation shall not be paid for a voyage during which the vessel enters or clears from a port in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone, if the distance between the terminal ports of the voyage is less than 150 nautical miles.

Section 409 provides (a) that compensation shall accrue only while the vessel is owned by a person, a citizen of the United States; (b) that compensation earned after three years from the enactment of this act shall not be paid to any vessel owner unless at all times during the period over which such compensation was earned at least 50 per cent of (1) the total gross tonnage of all vessels—other than those documented in the coastwise trade only, and other than those operating on the Great Lakes or adjacent or connecting waterways upon voyages neither beginning nor terminating east of Quebec, Canada—which are owned or chartered by such vessel owner, or for which such owner acts as agent, plus (2) the total gross tonnage of all such vessels owned or chartered by any person affiliated with such vessel owner, or for which such affiliated person acts as agent, is comprised of vessels registered under the laws of the United States; (c) that the affiliation referred to means ownership or control of 50 per cent of outstanding voting stock or voting power, or of 80 per cent of all outstanding stock or interest; (d) that the board may suspend from time to time the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section in respect to a power-driven vessel of a particular type or kind which any person desires to own or charter if, in the opinion of the board, vessels of such type or kind registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States are not reasonably available for the purposes desired, and that any vessel in respect to which such suspension is made shall not be counted in computing gross tonnage for the purpose of subdivision (b).

Section 410 provides (a) that whenever the board determines that in order to promote the welfare of the United States the operation of vessels in any particular service, or of any particular type or kind, is desirable and necessary and that the rate of compensation under section 404 is insufficient to induce the operation of vessels in such service, or of such type and kind, the board in making the contract for compensation may provide therein for such increase of compensation as it deems necessary to these ends, the increase not to be more than twice the rate under section 404; (b) that the board in making contracts of compensation may decrease the compensation under section 404 in any particular case to such extent as it deems advisable; (c) that after making the contract of compensation the board may, with the consent of the other party, decrease, or increase to a figure not more than twice the rate under section 404, the rate of compensation to be paid, provided that no expenditure shall be made from the merchant marine fund because of any increased compensation granted after contracts have been made, except out of appropriations made annually therefrom by Congress; (d) that no increase or decrease shall be made under this section unless specifically authorized by the board on the affirmative vote of not less than five members, and unless such vote and a full statement of the reasons therefor are spread on the minutes of the board.

Section 411 provides (a) that the contract may require a vessel to be operated in a particular service—the term "service" including, by previous definition in the bill, the route, frequency of sailings, and speed—(1) if the rate of compensation is based thereon and (2) if the contract also provides a different rate of compensation to be paid for any period of time after obligation of owner to operate the vessel in such service has been terminated as herein provided; (b) that if the contract provides for operation in a particular service the owner's obligation may terminate on six months' written notice to the board; that on failure of owner to operate the vessel in such service (act of God and restraint of princes excepted) before his obligation has terminated, then (1) all rights to compensation earned since the last time for payment provided in the contract may, at the board's option, be forfeited, and (2) the board may terminate the entire contract.

Section 412 provides that any vessel under a compensation contract may at any time during the life of the contract be taken and purchased or used by the United States for national defense or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President; that in such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of taking or paid fair compensation for her use based upon such fair actual value, said value not to be enhanced in either case by the causes necessitating the taking; that in case the vessel is taken and used but not purchased the vessel shall be restored to the owner in a condition at least as good as when taken, less reasonable wear and tear, or the owner shall be paid an amount for reconditioning sufficient to place the vessel in such condition; that the owner shall not be paid for any consequential damages arising from such taking and purchase or use; that in case of disagreement between the United States and the owner of the vessel as to the fair actual value, fair compensation, or amount for reconditioning, such value, compensation, or amount shall be determined by arbitration, one arbitrator to be selected by the President, one by the owner of the vessel, and the third by the two thus selected, or, if they can not agree, by the Chief Justice of the United States.

Section 413 provides that all repairs, renewals, or reconditioning of contract vessels or of their machinery or equipment shall be done in a port in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone, except that repairs or renewals may be made in a foreign port if the repairs or renewals are essential to the safety of the vessel, its passengers, crew, or cargo, or are made to a vessel operating exclusively between foreign ports under this act; that the board shall refuse to pay any person failing to perform his obligations under this section such amount of compensation as the board may determine.

Section 414 provides that if a vessel in respect to which a contract for compensation is made is sold prior to the expiration of the contract the compensation shall cease unless a new contract therefor is made with the purchaser.

Section 415 provides that any purchaser of a contract vessel before expiration of contract shall be held to take the vessel with notice of and subject to the right of the United States to take and purchase or use such vessel as provided in section 412.

Section 416 provides (a) that when used in this section the terms "taxable year," "gross income," "net income," and "invested capital" shall have the same meaning as when used in the revenue act of 1921.

(b) That the owner of a contract vessel or vessels shall pay the United States 50 per cent of the amount by which his net income for the taxable year attributable to the operation of such vessels exceeds 10 per cent of his invested capital for such year attributable to such vessels, but in no case shall the amount so paid exceed the compensation earned in respect to such vessels during the taxable year under a contract made under this title by the owner.

(c) That in computing the gross income attributable to the operations of the vessels there shall be included the compensation earned under this title in respect to vessels during the taxable year; that in computing the net income there shall be deducted from gross income a reasonable amount determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as representing the fair value of the products, services, or facilities furnished by the owner in connection with operations; that there shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income attributable to the operation of the vessels the deduction provided in section 265 of the revenue act of 1921 as amended by this act.

(d) That if the owner of vessels uses them in whole or in part for transportation of his own property, his gross income attributable to the operations of the vessels in transporting such property shall be considered to be such amount as is determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as representing the fair value of the services performed by the vessels in transporting such property.

(e) That if the owner of the vessel is an individual, a partnership, or an estate or trust, the invested capital shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal as nearly as may be practicable the invested capital that would be allowable to such owner if a corporation.

(f) That to secure an accurate distribution or apportionment of profits, income, deductions, or invested capital in computing net income or invested capital among two or more trades or businesses—whether incorporated or unincorporated, or whether or not organized or created in the United States—controlled directly or indirectly by the same interests the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may consolidate the accounts of such trades or businesses (1) if the person conducting one of such trades or businesses in dealing with the person conducting another bought from or sold to the other person during the taxable year products, services, or facilities at prices above or below the current market price, thus effecting an artificial distribution of profits, (2) or if one such person in any way so arranged his financial relations with another such person during the taxable year as to assign to either a disproportionate share of net income or invested capital, (3) or where for any reason it appears to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the net income or invested capital attributable to the vessels, as shown by the return of the owner, does not fairly reflect the actual or true net income or invested capital of the owner.

(g) That every person liable for the 50 per cent payment to the Government under this section shall make at the time and in the manner provided by law for making his income-tax return a return in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, stating his net income attributable to the operations of the vessels, his invested capital attributable to the vessels, and any other information relating to the determination of the amount payable under this section which may be required by the commissioner; that a copy of such return, together with all schedules and data submitted therewith, shall be transmitted to the board at the same time when the return is filed.

(h) That the entire amount for which a vessel owner is liable under this section shall be due and payable at the same time and in the same manner and collected in the same manner as the first installment of income tax imposed by law.

(i) That for the purposes of this section the amount of compensation earned in respect to vessels during the taxable year shall be determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

(j) That amounts paid under this section shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the merchant marine fund, and that any refunds for overpayment shall be paid therefrom on vouchers approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and countersigned by the chairman of the board.

(k) That provisions of the revenue act of 1921 and any other internal revenue laws relating to assessment, collection, remission, or refunding of income and excess-profits taxes shall, so far as practicable, apply to payments dealt with by this section.

(l) That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make rules and regulations for the enforcement and have charge of the administration of this section.

Section 417 provides (a) that the board shall provide in every contract for compensation with any person that such person agrees to accept and comply with sections 412, 413, 414, and 416, and that whether or not the contract does so provide, such person shall be held to have so agreed.

(b) That any contract for compensation with any person may be canceled by him at any time without the consent of the board, but that the cancellation shall not relieve him of obligations under sections 412 and 416, or of any obligation under section 411, to operate a vessel in any particular service.

(c) That the board shall provide in the contract no terms or conditions except those (1) which are specified in subdivision (a) of this section or in section 411, or (2) which are necessary to carry out sections 411, 412, 413, 414, and 416, or (3) which are necessary to ascertainment and determination of amount of compensation at rate fixed in contract payable under this title.

Section 418 provides that the board's determination as to amount of compensation to which any person is entitled under this title shall be subject to review by the General Accounting Office.

The fifth title is called "Army and Navy Transports."

Its first and only section, numbered 501, provides that whenever in the judgment of the President adequate transportation facilities to meet any or all of the needs of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps are afforded by vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, he may direct the discontinuance in whole or in part of the transport service of either the Army or the Navy and transfer to the board or place out of commission any of the vessels now or hereafter engaged in either of such services; that whenever such disposition is made the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, are authorized and directed to make contracts with owners of such vessels for transportation required, that the contracts may be for terms of 10 years, and that the board shall furnish necessary assistance in making them; that there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to meet payments required under such contracts.

The fifth title is named "Rail and Water Transportation."

Its first section, numbered 601, provides that, as used in this title, the term "commission" means Interstate Commerce Commission.

Section 602 declares (a) that it is the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation, and that the board and commission are hereby severally authorized, empowered, and directed to cooperate to that end.

(b) That the board and commission are authorized and directed to create a joint board from among their members, officers, and employees to study conditions and interrelations of rail and water traffic, the control, improvement, and extension of ocean freight terminals, and the principles and methods essential to the policy declared at the outset of this section.

(c) That the joint board shall hold regular meetings, appoint a secretary, keep minutes, and so forth.

(d) That the joint board shall make recommendations to the board and commission, which, if they approve, shall make them effective by such means as are granted by law, each acting within its own jurisdiction.

(e) That this section shall not affect the jurisdiction of the commission or create any power concurrent with its powers.

Section 603 provides that the board shall certify the form to be used by the commission in prescribing through bills of lading for exports.

Section 604 provides that paragraph (9), section 5, of the interstate commerce act, relating to rail-owned water lines, shall not apply when such common carrier by water or such vessel is engaged exclusively (a) in trade (other than with foreign contiguous territory) not included in the coastwise trade, or (b) in trade between United States ports and Philippine ports, or exclusively in trade on rivers or canals of the United States.

Section 605 amends section 15 of the shipping act of 1916, requiring filing of all agreements and understandings between carriers affecting water transportation, by requiring also the filing of all arrangements with railroads affecting joint rail and water shipments.

Section 606 amends section 6 of interstate commerce act so as to require railroads entering into agreements with ocean carriers under section 15 of the shipping act of 1916 to enter into similar arrangements with any and all other carriers by water from same port to same foreign country.

Section 607 amends section 28 of the merchant marine act of 1920 by requiring 30 days' notice before any suspension of that section becomes effective, and by providing that whenever the board and commission are both of opinion and certify that putting into effect or keeping in effect this section will cause unjust discrimination between ports of United States or as to commerce accustomed to move through such ports, or will materially change the channels of transportation within the United States, or in unduly congesting United States ports, the commission shall by order suspend said section until such time as it and the board decide otherwise, whereupon such suspension shall by order be terminated by the commission on 30 days' notice.

The seventh title is denominated "Miscellaneous provisions." The first section of this title, numbered 701, provides that officers and officials of the United States Government traveling at public expense shall use, as far as practicable, public vessels of the United States or vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under United States laws; that when such passage is not practicable vessels under foreign flags may be used only when ordered by the head of department or other Government establishment concerned, or on order approved by such head of department or other Government establishment, who shall promptly report each such voyage to the board with reasons showing necessity therefor.

Section 702 makes practically the same requirements as to Government supplies as are made as to officers and officials in section 701.

Section 703 amends section 12 of the shipping act of 1916 by requiring inclusion of all transactions with the merchant marine and construction-loan funds in the board's annual report to Congress.

Section 704 provides that (a) the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to designate such ports of entry as he deems advisable as ports of documentation for vessels.

(b) That for the purposes of section 30 of the merchant marine act of 1920, the section relating to ship mortgages, and of the navigation laws, the home port of a vessel shall be the port of documentation at or nearest to and in the same customs district as the place at which there is conducted the greater part of the vessel business of the owner of the vessel, except that the Secretary of Commerce shall by regulation prescribe the home port where he finds the above rule not applicable.

Section 705 amends the definition of certain terms in section 30 of the shipping act of 1916.

Section 706 amends section 4141, Revised Statutes, so as to read that every vessel except as otherwise provided by law shall be registered by the collector of customs at the home port of the vessel.

Section 707 amends a subsection of section 30 of the shipping act of 1916 relative to preferred mortgages and regulating their surrender, while section 708 amends section 42 of that act in regard to the surrender of documents.

Section 709 provides that except when otherwise specifically provided in this act, the board may make such regulations in respect to matters placed under its jurisdiction by this act as it deems necessary in order to make effective the intent and purposes of this act.

Section 710 provides that if any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this act and of the application thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Section 711, the last section of this title and of the bill itself, provides that this act may be cited as the "merchant marine act, 1922."

The first observation occurring to me after a review of this bill is that it contains a number of valuable legislative advances outside the subsidy provisions. These forward steps, with the Government gift features eliminated from the bill, and such portions of previous measures, beginning with the Democratic act of 1916, as remain unrepealed or have been perfected constitute a body of enactment under which the Shipping Board may continue successfully to develop an American merchant marine of satisfactory proportions. Congress could do no better service to American overseas trade than to strike out the subsidy and special-privilege sections of this bill and adopt most of the remainder.

There is one amendment in the first section of the bill, however, which calls for comment. That section in amending section 5 of the act of 1920 eliminates certain requirements relating to the sale of vessels, to wit, requirements that the board in fixing or accepting a sale price should consider the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for, vessels, existing freight rates, and prospects for their maintenance, cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as cost of construction or purchase price of vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell. It is true that the first section of the pending bill retains the direction in section 5 commanding the sale of vessels as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes of this act, but the expression "good business methods" relates here more to the time of sale than requirements to be observed in making it, and the fact that the framers of the act of 1920 deemed it necessary to add specific stipulation that market prices, construction costs, reproduction costs, and any other conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man not forced to sell shows that the framers of the act of 1920 had in mind the prevention of the closing out of our great merchant fleet for practically nothing, and on auction-block terms. Now, why is this stipulation omitted from the present bill? Why is it repealed by the present bill? The very fact of its elimination might be construed as authority to fling one of the most useful and valuable properties in the world to the winds.

The Shipping Board states in its last annual report, the report for the year ending June 30, 1922, that the construction cost of the vessels it owned on that date was $2,351,505,875.92. It tells us that the demand for this practically new and modern ship tonnage will increase as world conditions, now suffering one of the severest depressions ever known, improve and as present ship tonnage in use on all the seas nears the point of necessary replacement, a point large portions of it are about to reach on account of age. It does not give us a statement of its other assets in a sum combining them with these ship values, as was done in prior reports. It tells us that at present there is practically no market for ships. The few sales it did make during the last fiscal year were almost on terms of owners forced to sell. It tells us that the great fleet in lay up is being preserved at a cost strikingly small, a cost offset by a gradual increase in value due to world tonnage conditions heretofore specified. It tells us that the laid-up fleet is being held in readiness for replacements as they become necessary in our own service. Is it not madness under such circumstances to strike out the safeguards thrown around the sale of these ships by the act of 1920? The policy announced by the board in its last annual report, a policy I outlined in detail, would certainly negative the idea of sacrifice sales. This makes the amendment making such sales possible by striking out the sale requirements in the act of 1920, heretofore described, all the more a mystery. The amendment should be disagreed to and the requirements of section 5 of the act of 1920 retained without modification.

In this connection I call attention to another fact. The subsidies provided in this bill are so arranged that almost all the cargo ships owned by the Government will get only the minimum rate. As I have heretofore shown, only a handful of these ships will be in the next two classes above the minimum, while the 10 next higher classes call for a speed no Government-owned ship possesses. Thus the Government is called upon to give the lion's share of a subsidy mounting through the years to hundreds of millions from its own Treasury to ships with which its own can not compete. The blow such a measure would deal to the value and availability of the present fleet can hardly be measured. The Germans found a way to sink their ships at Scapa Flow. Is this another way to sink ours? The whole transaction looks as if a fleet of merchant ships built with the money of the people must be annihilated to enable more ships to be built by private interests at the further expense of the people.

This subsidy to private shipowners is morally wrong. Congress has no more right to take the money of the taxpayers and hand it over to men and corporations engaged in ship operation than it has to give it to those engaged in other trades as an inducement or premium for the pursuit of their vocations. It would be legislative embezzlement of the most vicious type.

This subsidy is economically wrong. No merchant marine will endure upon the artificial basis of cash donations from the Government. A permanent marine must be built on merit alone—merit and ability matched against the competition of the world. The receipt of a subsidy postpones the hour of real trial, the trial which the recipient will face with weakened will when the subsidy ceases, as cease some day it must. The ship that survives in ocean trade is the ship that makes its way solely from the returns its services produce. Armed with that capacity its place on the main is a lasting one.

This subsidy is practically wrong. With more ships on hand than we can use, why build more? With a Government-owned fleet, which cost the people nearly two billions and a half, more than two-thirds of which is in lay up awaiting the revival of commerce, with an American merchant marine composed of both Government and private ships, and all managed privately, transporting more than 50 per cent of our foreign trade tonnage, composing the largest merchant marine in our history—the second largest in the world—why expend four hundred and fifty millions in gratuities and hundreds of millions in loans to force the construction of more ships. The cry of the war was more ships, and they blossomed from the ways by thousands, exemplifying the constructive genius of a Schwab, the executive capacity of a Hurley, the energy of a Piez, the unerring judgment of a Payne, the intellectual power of a Benson. The cry of peace is not more ships but more markets. We have the ships. What we need is a secure world market. Give us that and our present shipping facilities will be more than ample.

This subsidy will be a source of increased expense. Its elaborate ratings will require elaborate supervision. It means the installation of a new system in the promotion of our merchant marine, a system largely experimental. New and experimental systems are costly, as a rule, to the last degree. The statement that the Fleet Corporation is losing fifty millions a year was based partly on items during the last fiscal year that are rapidly disappearing. It was based on an excess of construction cost over outlay of nearly twenty millions, but the construction program is practically ended. It was based also on an excess of transportation and housing cost over outgo of over fifteen millions, but these elements will vanish as construction ceases. The Shipping Board's consolidated cash statement for the last fiscal year, covering receipts and disbursements of all kinds, shows an unexpended balance on June 30, 1922, of $66,521,117.02, as against an unexpended balance on June 30, 1921, of $34,047,304.54.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to inquire how they figure out their loss at $50,000,000 a year with that kind of a cash balance staring them in the face?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is as much of a mystery to me as the advocacy by the Shipping Board of a subsidy after denouncing the principle of the subsidy in their last annual report.

This subsidy operates unfairly even among its beneficiaries. Based on speed for all ratings above the minimum the faster and costlier the vessel the larger will be the subsidy. In fact, it was recently announced that eastern capitalists were preparing to construct, with the enormous financial aid they would receive under this bill in the event it became law, two passenger liners eclipsing in size and speed anything the world has yet beheld; liners 1,000 feet long and of 70,000 gross tons each; liners that would make the Majestic and the Leviathan look like canal boats. It has been estimated that these ships would get about $4,000,000 a year in basic subsidy under this bill, or twice that amount if the board should so allow, the board having the power to double the basic grants.

An expert of the Shipping Board testified at the hearings that the Leviathan would get $900,000 a year in basic subsidy from the Treasury under this bill, and the subsidy could be doubled under this bill if the board should so desire. On the other hand, ordinary cargo vessels, such as make up the bulk of the present Shipping Board fleet and such as carry most of the world's commerce, including farm products, would receive only a few thousand dollars each per annum. It will be seen that the subsidy favors the huge and luxurious passenger vessel, designed mainly for the accommodation of the wealthier classes, the pleasure seekers, the tourists, the globe-trotters, the moneyed idlers, the feasters, and revelers of America's vulgar, dollar-worshiping aristocracy.

This subsidy is an abdication by Congress of the control it should retain over the disposition of the people's money. Under this bill, as it comes to the Senate, the board has the power to grant subsidies for 10 years in semiannual payments, and the moneys needed to meet such payments are permanently appropriated in advance. The House put in a provision—a provision which the Senate Commerce Committee has stricken out—to the effect that these payments could not be obtained except from annual congressional appropriations, approximately as the payments were earned and became due. This is the way our public-building contracts and our river and harbor contracts are handled. Why make an exception of the men to whom we are giving money as an inducement to continue their usual vocation? It is a healthy thing for Congress to retain the power of appropriation to meet deferred contract payments it has authorized. The retention of such power is a salutary check on executive and administrative agencies.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that connection, if this bill with the cash subsidy provision in it shall pass the present Congress, it is almost certain that the next Congress will repeal that portion of the bill; and the result will be that we will have on our hands for the next 10 years claims for damages on account of the discontinued payments.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And we would have the further anomalous condition of such contracts as had been entered into by the board after the bill became a law and before its repeal being beyond the power of Congress to recall.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I think constitutionally, perhaps, the Congress would have the right to change the contracts, but the same restriction is not in the Federal Constitution that is in the usual State constitution. If, however, we repealed the law these people would have a claim for violation of their contracts with us, which would cost the Government, no doubt, a very large sum. I think it is conceded by everybody that even should this cash provision of the subsidy bill be passed the next Congress will certainly repeal it, because we all know that the next Congress will not be favorable to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In any event, the result will be extremely undesirable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Furthermore, the language of the subsidy section limiting subsidy payments to $30,000,000 a year is so indefinite as to invite violation. The board is forbidden to make contracts which it is satisfied will exceed in totality thirty millions a year. If a mistaken satisfaction, an erroneous self-assurance, should lead it to make contracts involving forty millions or fifty millions Congress would be helpless to undo them. The mere recital by the board of its "satisfaction" that the limit would not be exceeded would justify a transgression of the proposed limit.

This subsidy is a contradiction of all for which America stands. It is a denial of the principles on which the career of this Republic is based, individual initiative, resource, and responsibility, equality of opportunity, impartiality of authority. It belies our history and imperils our institutions. It brings us to the brink of an issue involving the nature and genius of our ideals. Shall we turn from the pathway along which we have walked in glory for more than a hundred years? Shall we erase the legend of equal rights from the heart and memory of the Union and substitute the sinister symbols of special privilege?

If so, the Constitution of the United States may be resolved into a single word: Subsidy!

SENATOR M'CORMICK'S LETTER TO SENATOR LODGE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as time drags itself along incidents often happen that in the making attract no attention, but which are of sufficient importance when brought to light to impress themselves upon the whole country. There was such an incident just before the recent election. It involved what is or should be an historic document, a document which should be preserved in the archives of the country. I am going to have it placed in the RECORD so that generations yet to come may have an opportunity to read it. It was the expression of one high in authority and one who spoke by the card, so to speak.

I refer to the letter which was written by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], a member of the majority in this Chamber, chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee. He wrote the letter to the leader of the Republican Party in this body. The peculiar part of the incident was that the letter was written immediately before the election, with instructions not to have it printed until after the election. It so happens that it was printed just as the Senator had left the shores of America, sailing over the placid waters of the Atlantic, on his way to European lands, to put out feelers, for the President, perhaps, touching economic conditions in Europe. It was to be published after he had removed himself from the shouts of a victorious Democracy, far and away from the lamentations of his repudiated colleagues and party bearers. I do not know whether Senators on the other side of the aisle have read this remarkable document, so I am going to ask to have it read at the desk. I am sorry the Senator from Illinois is not now in his seat, because I sent him word and I had hoped he would be here. I am sorry the distinguished leader on the other side of the Chamber, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], to whom the letter was sent, is not in his seat. I told him that perhaps the matter would come up. But those two Senators have conveniently absented themselves.

Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read the letter to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: You know that I was greatly disappointed not to see you in Massachusetts before sailing to Europe, there to see my mother and to make some study of economic conditions. I wanted to talk with you again upon the urgency of putting aside the rule under which the chairmen of the Senate committees are chosen by reason of their seniority of service on the committees, and for no other reason, and to talk with you, too, about the constitution of a steering committee which may be truly representative of the average opinion of the Republican majority of the Senate and which, in collaboration with the steering committee of the House, may labor energetically and effectively to enact our legislative program.

We owe the country the creation of such a steering committee and the abolition of the binding seniority rule. I can speak so frankly to you because of the intimate consideration which you have always shown me and because of your own energetic and representative activity. But we do know that although in a majority of instances the men who have become chairmen through seniority have been good chairmen, there have been others who were unfitted for their posts by reason of extreme old age or of failing health or because of grave differences of opinion with the majority of their Republican associates.

DUTIES OF A CHAIRMAN.

Certainly I would be the last to challenge the right or the duty of a Senator to assert his independent opinion or to differ with any majority. A Senator is elected to represent his constituency according to his best judgment and his conscience, but the chairman of a committee acts not in his sole representative capacity but as the representative of the majority of that committee of the majority in the Senate to which he belongs. Naturally, more, he is the executive agent of the committee, burdened with the labors of the committee, and required vigilantly to press for the consideration of the bills reported by it.

The old system served very well in the old days. In the majority of cases, as I have already said, the majority of chairmen who have come to their posts under the seniority rule have been representative and capable chairmen, but the Republican conference and the Republican steering committee owe it to the country to put aside the rule, just as the conference owes it to the country to make provision for the selection of a truly representative steering committee, which shall meet regularly and which as occasion may require shall meet with the corresponding committee of the House.

There is no other way in which we can dispatch the great volume of business devolved upon Congress as a consequence of the war, bring the sessions of Congress to a reasonably early conclusion, and, finally, make certain that we write legislation which represents the common judgment of the majority of the country and meets its pressing needs.

I wish I might have talked this over with you, as I have had opportunity to talk it over with other Senators during the campaign, and since the campaign with CURTIS. I feel very certain that you will agree with us, and I write now in the hope that if Congress reassembles before the end of my hurried journey to Europe, you will have counseled with other Senators to the end that we may do our duty to the country.

Always faithfully yours,

MEDILL MCCORMICK.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator from Mississippi seen the reply to that letter?

Mr. HARRISON. No; and that is why I wanted the majority leader to be on the floor of the Senate, in order that he could read to us a copy of the reply. The newspapers have not carried the reply. It is another chapter in secret diplomacy.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Were there any reservations in that reply?

Mr. HARRISON. I suspect that there were many upon the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. A copy of this letter, I think, was sent to the vice chairman of the majority party, the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who graces us with his presence. I do not know whether he has made reply as yet to the copy of that letter.

Mr. CURTIS. There was no reply asked for in my case.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a good excuse for the Senator not to make reply.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The session of Congress was not delayed, was it?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I think not.

Mr. President, on yesterday I asked that the resolution offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] touching the appointment of a select committee to revamp the rules of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Rules. In that resolution the Senator from Washington desired that the committee be "authorized and directed to study the rules of procedure of the Senate, and to report and recommend what changes should be made in order to expedite business and enable a majority to bring a question to a vote for final action."

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from Mississippi does not take an exception to that part of the resolution which advises the colleagues of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to study the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. No, I do not; for a good many of them ought to study the rules of the Senate. However, that would not go to answer the charges that are made by the American people against this Congress.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who wrote the letter to the majority leader which I have had read at the Secretary's desk, differs from the Senator from Washington. He does not lay the blame to the fact that the rules are antiquated and need revising, but he says that Senators on the other side have a steering committee that does not steer legislation properly through the Senate; that on some committees there are chairmen who should not be chairmen at all; that there should be a change of policy here; and that it is "due to the American people" that that course should be pursued.

Perhaps some Senators do not catch the force of some of the expressions which are contained in the remarkable historic document which I have had read. Let us look merely at a few passages of it.

[At this point Mr. HARRISON yielded for the presentation by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN of the certificate of election of Senator elect EDWARD I. EDWARDS, of New Jersey, which was read and ordered to be placed on file.]

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Delaware desires to present the commission of another Democratic Senator, I yield to him for that purpose.

[Mr. BALL presented the certificate of election of THOMAS F. BAYARD, of Delaware, which was read and ordered to be filed.]

Mr. HARRISON. That is very good reading. I am very thankful to the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Delaware for interrupting me so that commissions bringing more Democrats into the Senate might be read. Those commissions, however, add weight and force to this remarkable letter. They are breathing examples of its living truths.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois—and I regret to see that he has not come into the Chamber as yet—said:

I wanted to talk with you again upon the urgency of putting aside the rule under which the chairmen of the Senate committees are chosen by reason of their seniority of service on the committees and for no other reason, and to talk with you, too, about the constitution of a steering committee which may be truly representative of the average opinion of the Republican majority in the Senate.

It is pretty hard to ascertain the average opinion of the Republican majority in the Senate at this time on any question; but I am curious to know just who constitute the membership of the steering committee on the majority side. I see sitting before me a very distinguished leader of the Republican Party [Mr. WATSON], and it may be that he can tell us just who are the members of the steering committee against whom the distinguished Senator from Illinois inveighs and whom he criticizes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I do not know who they are.

Mr. HARRISON. There we are. I am wondering if the Senator from Illinois is a member of the steering committee. Certainly the Senator from Indiana is not a member of the steering committee, or he would know its members, because he always knows "where he is at." It may be that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] can give us the information.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not a member of the committee, and I do not know.

Mr. HARRISON. We can not find out much about the personnel of the Republican leadership in this body. The Senator from Utah says he is not a member of the steering committee and does not know who its members are. I wonder who does know the membership of the Republican steering committee. Perhaps the reason why things have been going so badly is that nobody knows who constitute the steering committee. Is that the way legislation has been "steered" through this body? Is that the reason why the Republican Party brought in a bill here to loan to Liberia $5,000,000 and consumed about six weeks of time and then sent it back to the committee without any action? Is that the work of the steering committee, the members of which no Republican Senator sitting before me knows. I wonder if the Senator from Oregon knows or if the Senator from South Dakota knows. Does not anybody know who constitute the steering committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was going to suggest that perhaps the steering committee is not made up of Members of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps not; it has been transplanted to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator to give us the names of the steering committee.

Mr. STERLING. I apprehend that the members of the committee are in the performance of their duties now and that is the reason they are not on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, they have been performing their duty in that way for a long time, because they never stay on the floor and they never tell the Senate what to steer. That is the trouble.

I do not blame the Senator from Illinois for penning this letter to the distinguished leader of his party in the Senate. It will be noted that the letter was written at a time when the Senator from Illinois had just returned from the smoke of political battle in many sections of the country. He had heard the clash of political steel in Ohio, Michigan, and practically all the States of the Union; Massachusetts was the exception. He confesses in his letter that he did not take part in the campaign in Massachusetts. Perhaps if he had done so he might have increased the majority of his distinguished leader, or it may have been that the distinguished leader on the Republican side would have been defeated; who knows?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means his plurality, does he not?

Mr. HARRISON. His plurality, yes; that is better.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was going to suggest that he might have increased the plurality, but whose plurality?

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Mr. President, one who is designated by his colleagues as chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee is bound to have great weight and influence; and so, soon after he had come into contact with the people, heard their complaints, saw the closed factories, realized the extent of unemployment, and listened to the criticisms of the farmers of the great Middle West and of the miners of the mining sections of the country, he penned these lines in which he said to the leader of his party in the Senate, "I will tell you we can not go on this way; we have got to revamp the 'unknown' steering committee of the Senate; we must get new chairmen; we must mend our ways." He said this about that:

> The old system served very well in the old days.

Before the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, of course, it served all right; but this progressive Senator from the great State of Illinois, whose campaign is rapidly approaching, who must go before his people next year, and who, as that occasion approaches, becomes more progressive all the time, says:

> In the majority of cases, as I have already said, the majority of chairmen who have come to their posts under the seniority rule have been representative and capable chairmen—

That is a broad confession on the part of the Senator from Illinois; but he continues—

> but the Republican conference and the Republican steering committee owe it to the country—

Not to the Republican Party but to the country—> to put aside the rule, just as the conference owes it to the country to make provision for the selection of a truly representative steering committee—one which will respond to the needs of the country.

Who is the steering committee? I am sorry the distinguished vice chairman of the Republican conference has left the Chamber, for I was just getting ready to propound an inquiry to him, because somebody knows who constitute the steering committee, which is not representative of the average Republican majority here.

I have no idea who it is that the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee is talking about. If he is indirectly finding fault with the leadership of the Senator from Massachusetts he should have been a little more explicit, because when you read the lines closely the letter carries that insinuation. I do not know whether the Senator from Massachusetts put that construction on it or not. I am sorry he is not here, so that he could tell us, but he is not. At any rate, the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee is finding fault with the steering committee, and I imagine—I wish some one over there would tell us—that the leader of the majority party in this body is the chairman of the steering committee.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the Senator think the situation grave enough to have an investigating committee appointed?

Mr. HARRISON. To investigate the steering committee?

Mr. STERLING. No; to find out who the steering committee is.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, I think so; but I do not think you are going to find anyone over there who will admit being on it, who will assume the responsibility for the do-nothing policy that you have adopted and the record that you have made. What sayeth the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I can say to my genial friend from Mississippi that I think, without knowing, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] are both on the steering committee.

Mr. HARRISON. That is two.

Mr. WATSON. I am not a member of the steering committee, and therefore am not interested. I know that when we have measures in which we are especially interested, of sufficient gravity to excite the attention of the country, or we deem it necessary to call especial attention to any measure of particular merit, we have conferences for the purpose of determining our course of procedure. Whether or not the steering committee ever functions, of course I am not able to say, and therefore I can not gratify the wishes of my friend by telling him who they are or whether or not they ever meet. It will be necessary for him to ask some member of the committee in order to obtain that information.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Indiana does not agree with his colleague from Illinois, then, that the steering committee needs changes badly and that the whole fault is in the steering committee, does he?

Mr. WATSON. No; I do not think the fault is in the steering committee. As long as the steering committee does not steer, I guess it does not matter much who its members are.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator thinks that the Senator from Illinois was just mistaken about this charge that he has made?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Illinois may have some knowledge of the situation that I do not possess as to the functions or functioning of the steering committee. He may know whether or not they have met. I do not.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator see any reason for changing the rules as suggested by the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee?

Mr. WATSON. I am very decidedly in favor of changing the rules of the United States Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. According to this suggestion?

Mr. WATSON. No; I am not interested in that; but, inasmuch as the Senator has asked me, I am interested in changing the rules so that after a reasonable discussion a majority can transact the business of the country that we were sent here to transact. If I had my way about it, if there should be no special session of Congress, I would have the President call a special session of the Senate of the United States for the express purpose of changing its rules, and of sitting here long enough to change them, so that a majority of the body might function and prevent what is going on now in the United States Senate, namely, a filibuster.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think there is a filibuster now going on?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. And the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] agrees with him as to that?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, certainly I do.

Mr. HARRISON. And yet the Senator from Utah this morning, while the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] was delivering a prepared speech——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was prepared.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it took him months, and if the Senator from Utah had studied the question of ship subsidy as the Senator from Texas has he would not hold to the views that he has now in favor of this bill. But, while the Senator from Texas was delivering himself of this splendid speech, thoroughly prepared, giving information to the country—every line and syllable of the speech was touching the subject matter—the Senator sought an interruption and took up the time of the Senate in reading a whole lot of data in some report about rents; and that is generally the case. More of the time of the Senate is taken up by Senators on the other side than by Senators on this side, and yet they charge a filibuster!

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator can say that, but the record will speak. I simply asked the Senator from Texas if he would yield to me in order that I might present that report that I wanted to make before the end of the year as chairman of the building commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, he yielded.

Mr. SMOOT. He did, and he yielded very graciously. I would not have asked him to yield, but I expected the Senator from Texas to speak the balance of the day. I did not know what amount of time had been assigned to him to occupy in this filibuster. It might have been all day to-day, and it might have been all day to-morrow, and I wanted to get that report in, and it took only a few minutes. I do not know what assignments have been made for each one of the Senators on the other side. I know, of course, that the Senator from Mississippi is going to take this time here. He is not talking about the shipping bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I am trying to get from the Republican side some information that I can not get.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can get it by not standing on the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah if it is not a fact that after he had read and read and read from some report that nobody had heard anything about or knew anything of or cared anything about one of the Senators on his side had to ask him for goodness sake to desist and not read any more but to put it in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the fact, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] ask the Senator that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Connecticut did not.

Mr. HARRISON. And then did not the Senator from Utah say, "Oh, well, if you do not want to hear it, all right"?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut did not ask that. The Senator from Connecticut objected to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] interrupting me, which the Senator from Connecticut thought, and no doubt truly, was for no other purpose than to take up time; it was a part of the filibuster; and therefore he objected to my answering those questions, as I was speaking by unanimous consent. That is the truth of the case.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us get the reporter's notes and have them read and see just what did transpire.

Mr. SMOOT. That is part of the filibuster, too. That would take that much time.

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield now to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, as eager as we are always to listen to the very mellifluent language and flow of speech of the Senator from Mississippi, if the steering committee on this side were really steering the business of the Senate——

Mr. HARRISON. They are not.

Mr. WATSON. I doubt very seriously whether they would steer the Senator on the floor as often as he appears.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that I am not under the directions of the Republicans. I would not be. That is one charge I would not desire even my friend from Indiana to make against me.

Mr. WATSON. Does the steering committee on the other side function, and can the Senator tell me who the members of that committee are?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I can tell the Senator every one of them; and we function, too.

Mr. WATSON. Do they ever meet?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; we meet every time you try to put over some nefarious legislation here, and we try to stop it.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator say in all seriousness that the members of the steering committee on the other side really meet?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; when the occasion arises; and we know our steering committee members. We are not ashamed of the fact that they are members.

Mr. WATSON. Has the steering committee on the other side had a meeting this session?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; I think they have had several meetings.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator thinks so. Does he know?

Mr. HARRISON. There was not much reason, really, for the steering committee to meet this time, because we all knew that we were against the ship subsidy bill as soon as it was proposed, and that is the only thing that has been up.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. Is the Senator a member of the steering committee?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am not a member of it.

Mr. WATSON. Can the Senator name the members?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Does the Senator want me to name them?

Mr. WATSON. No; I am not interested.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to give the Senator information, even though he does not reciprocate.

Mr. President, I thought there would leak out in this discussion what is being planned, I will not say by the steering committee but by the majority side of this Chamber, deliberately done, and this is what it is—to try to impress the country with the idea that the Democrats are filibustering. The Senator from Utah last Friday, when the Senate had not been in session an hour and a half, charged that there was a filibuster on this side of the Chamber. Every time the argument gets too hot for the Senator from Utah, and he can not make a legitimate answer, he cries "Filibuster!" Why, he whispers it sometimes while he is at his desk writing a letter back to his constituents in Utah—"Filibuster!" I imagine sometimes he cries it in his dreams.

What has happened? We have been in session only about four weeks, and several days of that time were taken up by the Christmas holidays, and more days were taken up by the New Year holidays. During that time we passed four large appropriation bills. We assisted you in passing them. I have never seen a debate so confined to the issue as that that has been presented on this floor with reference to the ship-subsidy legislation. Why, I think when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was up in the Senate you discussed it for about six months in the Senate; it may have been longer than that. Here is a ship subsidy bill that will make every consumer in the country feel the heavy burden of increased taxes, and when we propose to discuss it and unfold its nefarious provisions to the American people we are told by the leaders on the other side, not members of the steering committee—because nobody knows who the members of the steering committee are—that there is a filibuster in progress! If there were a filibuster here upon the part of the Democratic side you would not have passed a single appropriation bill by this time; yet there has not been a whole day consumed in the consideration of a single appropriation bill that carried millions of dollars of appropriations by the Congress. Filibuster! Is not the Senator sorry he made that assertion?

Mr. WATSON. I will explain what I meant.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I can express my sorrow in these words: First, I express gratification at the fact that our friends on the other side have not filibustered or attempted to filibuster against the passage of any appropriation bill, for which we are duly grateful.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator ever see appropriation bills passed through the Senate with more haste?

Mr. WATSON. I never have.

Mr. HARRISON. And yet the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says there is a filibuster!

Mr. WATSON. No; not on appropriation bills, which everybody understands; but I express my sorrow over the fact that our Democratic friends have determined, as nobody knows they have better than my friend from Mississippi, that there shall not be a vote taken at this session of Congress on the passage of the ship subsidy bill. Is not that a fact?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that it is a fact. I should like to see the bill killed.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. And I hope there will not be a vote taken on the proposition.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. HARRISON. But I am not going to take part in a filibuster against the bill, and I know of no Senator on this side who intends to filibuster against the ship subsidy bill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, of course the Senator would like to see the bill killed, because he is opposed to it, and he is conducting himself in a manner that tends to kill it.

Mr. HARRISON. Because I am talking about this letter from your chairman to the leader of your party in this body touching the organization of the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly. Now, let me ask my friend, who is always frank and candid, if it is not a fact that he and his associates do not intend that any vote shall be taken on the ship subsidy bill at this session?

Mr. HARRISON. I know nothing about it. They have not taken me into their confidence. I know one thing: If you do adopt that plan, if you ever pass a ship subsidy bill, you will not make as good a race next time as you did this last time in Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. We did very well in Indiana, I think.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think so, too.

Mr. HARRISON. I think, too, that the Senator's party did better than he really thought they would do.

Mr. McKELLAR. They did splendidly in Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. No; they did not do as well as I thought they would do.

Mr. HARRISON. But they did as well as he hoped they would—no, I will not say that. I withdraw it.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator ought to withdraw that.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw that, because the Senator made speeches all over Indiana, and they were good speeches.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. Every county into which the Senator went, went Democratic.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the Senator's fingers were crossed at the time or not, but he made good speeches.

Mr. WATSON. I know that my friend, on account of our close relationship, would not do me an injustice.

Mr. HARRISON. I certainly would not.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator knows that when a man is nominated by my party I am for that candidate. I am a regular Republican.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question about that.

Mr. WATSON. Not the slightest, and I supported the candidate for the Senate in Indiana with the same zeal that I supported the rest of the ticket, at all times, and under all circumstances.

Mr. HARRISON. With too much zeal.

Mr. WATSON. And no one is warranted in making any assertion to the contrary.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator understood me to say he made many eloquent speeches throughout Indiana, did he not?

Mr. WATSON. For which I thanked the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator agrees with me in that statement, does he not?

Mr. WATSON. I certainly do. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, while we are in an affable and humorous frame of mind, I really want to become serious enough to ask my friends on the other side, several of whom are confronting me with their faces wreathed in smiles, while in that frame of mind, I want to ask them deliberately and candidly to tell me whether or not they intend that a vote shall ever be taken on the ship subsidy measure at this session of Congress?

Mr. HARRISON. It depends. If your steering committee would get to functioning or reorganize, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, so that you would really transact the public business and you knew how to do it, you would get to a vote.

Mr. WATSON. Inasmuch as I should like to test, I will not say the sincerity of my friend, because he is always sincere——

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. But his sincerity in the statement just made; inasmuch as it is my belief that the Democrats do not intend that any vote shall be taken on the ship subsidy bill at this session, in order to test their sincerity I now ask unanimous consent that we vote on the ship subsidy measure two weeks from to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the way with the Senator; he does not want a bill discussed, so that the American people can be informed about it.

Mr. WATSON. Then I ask unanimous consent that we vote on the measure six weeks from to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection myself, but there ought to be a roll call and Senators should be here. If the steering committee of the Republican Party thought that that might be done, they would themselves object.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I can not take time to hunt up the steering committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator can not locate it.

Mr. WATSON. In the first place, I do not know who they are, and, in the second place, they do not have anything to do with steering my conduct at this time. I am now asking unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote on the ship subsidy bill may be taken six weeks from to-day at 4 o'clock.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I offer an amendment to the Senator's request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WATSON. I think not. I am anxious to have the Chair state my proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator might be willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. WATSON. I will permit the Senator to state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That we vote 30 days after the next session of Congress meets.

Mr. WATSON. I will accept no such amendment as that. I would like to have the Chair state the request.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator agree to an amendment that no "lame ducks" vote on this proposition?

Mr. WATSON. I would like to have the Presiding Officer put my proposition to the Senate.

Mr. KING. I think there is no necessity for that. I object, if it is put in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. WATSON. Did I understand the Senator from Utah to object?

Mr. KING. To relieve the Chair from the burden of putting the request, I object.

Mr. HARRISON. And because of the embarrassment it would cause the Senator's party.

Mr. WATSON. It would be no embarrassment, I can assure my friend.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator have some other interruption?

Mr. WATSON. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator took up so much of my time——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is going to spoil a very good speech; but I will yield the floor in one minute, and then the Senator can get that action taken.

Some one has handed me a list—a Democrat, I think—headed "Republican committee on order of business." I wonder if that is the same thing as the steering committee? I can get no reply. Nobody knows. Do none of the Senators on the other side know anything about the movements of the Republican Party in this body? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator terms the "steering committee."

Mr. HARRISON. Steering committee: McCUMBER, chairman; LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; WADSWORTH, of New York; FERNALD, of Maine; FRANCE, of Maryland. They will have to revamp it after the 4th of March. FRELINGHUYSEN, New Jersey. KELLOGG—the people revamped it for you. McCORMICK, of Illinois. I wonder if he knew he was a member of the steering committee. And LODGE, ex officio member. Of the steering committee, which has steered the party in this body, four were defeated in the recent reckoning. No wonder the Senator from Illinois found fault, and the people recorded it with their votes. McCUMBER, FRANCE, FRELINGHUYSEN, and KELLOGG will be with us no more. So you will have an opportunity, after the 4th of March, of getting a new steering committee, in part, and carry out the suggestions, at least to that extent, made by the Senator from Illinois to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, the strange thing about all of this is that he wrote this letter immediately after a return from these various States, hearing the criticisms of the people, and knowing what the issues were; but he said, "Do not have it published until I am away out upon the briny deep." But I noticed this in one of the papers of November 7:

The Senator said to-day—

That is, the day he was leaving—he thought the news would be so sad that he could not stay here to receive it—

The Senator said to-day that the campaign had been hard work. He compared it to flogging a dead mule, saying that the voters in most States seemed satisfied and contented with the Republican administration, and that it had been hard to convince them that they ought to go to the polls to express their approval of President Harding and his work.

Then he prophesied an increased majority in the Senate, and I think an increased majority in the House. But on November 13, when this letter was published, it was stated that Senator McCORMICK was informed by radio of the severe blow suffered by the Republican Party in contests for the Senate and the House.

Mr. President, this letter, written under the circumstances, is a plea of confession upon the part of the distinguished chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee that his party has not made good. It is an indictment against you which should be answered. It is the stroke of a bold and courageous public servant. It will be an historic document, even though it was withheld from the public until the distinguished senatorial chairman was far wafted upon the bosom of the mighty Atlantic.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13374) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the request of the House for a conference be granted, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PAGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HALE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Fletcher	McKinley	Spencer
Bayard	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Stanley
Borah	George	Nelson	Sterling
Brookhart	Glass	New	Sutherland
Broussard	Harris	Nicholson	Townsend
Bursum	Harrison	Norris	Trammell
Calder	Heflin	Oddie	Underwood
Cameron	Johnson	Overman	Wadsworth
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Caraway	Kendrick	Poindexter	Warren
Couzens	King	Ransdell	Watson
Curtis	Ladd	Reed, Mo.	Weller
Dial	La Follette	Reed, Pa.	Williams
Dillingham	Lenroot	Sheppard
Ernst	Lodge	Smith
Fernald	McKellar	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I read in the newspapers last night about the best news I have heard in a long time, to wit, that the President of the United States had vetoed a pension bill. I must say that I had very little hope of any such act being performed, but it is indeed encouraging and reassuring.

I had not been in the Senate more than two or three months until there was a pension bill brought up for consideration providing for a considerable increase of Civil War pensions. I confess that I thought it was out of place, considering the condition in which the country was at that time and considering the great length of time that had transpired since the close of the Civil War. I ventured at that time to make a few remarks in opposition to the measure. I stated that I knew my effort was in vain, that it was useless to oppose the bill—at least that I had been so informed. However, I did not believe that the honest people of the United States in any section favored any such legislation. So I at least entered my protest.

Since that time there have been other bills before the Senate against which I have ventured to speak, almost in season and out of season, but I was very much discouraged and I could get very little, if any, help. There were a few Senators who entertained the same views I did, but we were so hopelessly in the minority that we did not make much of an impression upon this body. I had made up my mind, however, and had announced just yesterday that henceforward I expect to oppose any and all Civil War pension legislation. I wanted to put my colleagues on notice that I was not doing that for the purpose of incurring the enmity of any man, but that I would make general objection to such legislation; that I expected to read the reports and to bring to the attention of the Senate all of the private pension bills.

I remembered the good that great President Grover Cleveland, one of the greatest Presidents the country ever had, rendered the country during his term. I must say that I was delighted last night when I read that a Republican President had had the justice in his heart and the firmness of mind to veto a pension bill passed by a Republican Congress. I want to commend him. I feel that there is yet hope for the oppressed taxpayer. That action on the part of the President ought to encourage some of us who are opposed on principle to these raids on the Treasury. We are going to have renewed hope and will enter into new activities hereafter along those lines. Therefore I do not want any Senator to think there is anything personal about it, because I am against the whole principle of private pension. This bill would have added around $108,000,000 annually to the burden of the taxpayers and this would eventually amount to $50,000,000. Of course, I was opposed to its original passage and will certainly vote to sustain the President's veto.

Mr. President, it will be of interest to the country to bring to the attention of the Senate the matter of pensions in detail. I have before me the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922. It contains great information for the people of the country if they will but read it. On page 1 is contained a statement of comparisons of amounts paid out for the fiscal years 1921 and 1922, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Comparison of amounts paid out for the fiscal years 1921 and 1922.

For pensions during the fiscal year:
1921	$258,720,821
1922	253,807,583
For fees and expenses of examining surgeons:
1921	389,687
1922	327,164
For field and special examinations:
1921	86,269
1922	95,730
To pensioners in foreign countries:
1921	$1,342,022
1922	1,319,231

Mr. DIAL. On page 2 of the same report is a tabulation entitled "Information of general interest," which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Information of general interest.

	1921	1922

Largest number of Civil War widows on the roll was in 1912	304,373

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, can the Senator give us information as to how many Civil War pensioners are on the pension roll at the present time?

Mr. DIAL. At the present time, as set forth in Exhibit 13, on page 14 of the report to which I have referred, it is shown that there were 466,075 Civil War pensioners paid in 1922; 500,102 in 1921. I will ask that that table may also be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Pensioners of the different wars on the roll at the close of each of the last five fiscal years.

	1922	1921	1920	1919	1918
Civil War	466,075	500,102	533,729	568,343	591,793
War with Spain	55,153	39,282	30,432	28,251	27,513

World War	90	95	128	115	56
Total	547,016	566,053	592,190	624,427	646,895

Mr. DIAL. On page 16 of the same report appears Exhibit 16, being a comparative table of the value of an average pension of the different wars for the last five fiscal years, and on page 12 is Exhibit 10, showing the number of pensions granted by special acts of each Congress since March 4, 1861. I ask that these tables may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparative table of the value of an average pension of the different wars for the last five fiscal years.

	1922	1921	1920	1919	1918

Sixty-seventh (1921–June 30, 1922)	1
Total	59,125

Mr. DIAL. The last table, Exhibit 10, shows the number of pensions granted by special acts of Congress since March 4, 1861. To my mind it is a great evil and ought to be stopped. Anyone who is not eligible to a pension under the general law ought not to be able to come in and get it by special act of Congress. For instance, in the Forty-sixth Congress there were only 96 pensions granted by special act, and yet in the Sixty-fourth Congress there were 5,885 pensions granted by special act. I am glad to say that in the Sixty-seventh Congress there was but one pension granted. That is refreshing, if it might be continued. I want to commend that kind of procedure. I hope there will not be any more private Civil War pensions granted.

Mr. President, coming from the South as I do, perhaps it is not in the best taste in the world to speak about this matter, but the war has long since been over. The people of my section thought they were right in their action at that time and I have never doubted it. The fact is, the older I get the more I agree with them that they were right and advocated the right principle. This country, however, is one country. The Government has needed help at different times and our section has responded nobly. I remember that in Union, the adjoining county to that in which I live, they did not conscript a single soldier during the last war. Every man required volunteered before the time came for conscription. We bought bonds. We paid taxes. We fought in the war. We have done our part.

I think it is time to quit persecuting one section of the country by levying this tribute in the name of a pension. All one has to do is label a bill "pension," and it seems to become hallowed. We seem to have been pensioning people whether they were in battle or not, irrespective of their means, whether they were wounded, or anything of the kind. Anybody who can establish a relationship to a man who was in the war seems to be wanting a pension. They have gone wild in the granting of monthly pensions of from $50 to $72.

I am glad the President vetoed the bill. I commend and congratulate him for his action. I think there is hope for the taxpayer. I see signs of equilibrium returning in the Senate, and I am glad it is returning in the early part of the year so we can all make good resolutions and try to live up to them.

We ought to watch the Treasury more closely. I see before me, honoring me with his attention, my good friend the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I am glad to have his assistance in these matters, or, rather, I should say, I am glad to render him all the assistance within my power. We are going to establish a militant bloc—I believe that is what they call it when they get ready to fight—here in the Senate, irrespective of party, and we are going to see that the people are treated better. I do not believe that the honest people, the fair-minded people, of the United States in any State or any section favor this great increase of pensions and favor the principle of primogeniture in extending pensions. Notwithstanding a few of the States receive a tremendous amount, yet I do not believe that the working people of those States, the people who labor and the people who create things, the people who pay taxes, and the people who amount to something, favor any such unjust procedure as was proposed in this pension legislation.

Mr. President, I merely wanted to express my hope that in the future, as in the past, this will be a great country, this will be a great body, and this will be a great Government, and that we will legislate in the interest of all the people and not in favor of a class.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I note that the Senator referred to "people who amount to something." Does the Senator mean by that the bankers of the country?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; some bankers. I have no ill will against a man who has something. If he acquired it in the proper way, he is to be commended. I have not much respect for a man who does not try to acquire something; neither have I any love for the man who oppresses; but I want everyone to try to better his condition, whether it is through the exercise of his muscle or his brain or the use of his means.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for another question?

Mr. DIAL. With pleasure.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Does the Senator from South Carolina himself belong to the banker class?

Mr. DIAL. I am one of the people.

Mr. NICHOLSON. But that does not answer my question. Is the Senator a banker?

Mr. DIAL. I am one of the people who take an interest in this Government. I am one who tries to better his condition and the condition of mankind. I spend my time along that line.

Mr. NICHOLSON. That is, the Senator spends his time by taking the other man's money and loaning it back to him at interest?

Mr. DIAL. No; I have, perhaps, paid more interest than has any other man of my means and my undertakings in my section of the State of South Carolina; but I am glad to say that my paper is good at any bank where I present it. I endeavor to help the one who tries to help himself. This is as great work as one could perform.

Mr. President, in all seriousness, times are getting better, and I wish to make the statement for the benefit of the people that they need not lose hope. I am interested in various enterprises—manufacturing, farming, developing water powers, and various activities which add to the wealth of the country and which give employment to the people. I try to better the condition of mankind to the utmost extent of my means and my influence.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 13559) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 988) thereon, which will be printed under the rule.

I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, as soon after the Senate convenes as possible, I shall ask that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORT OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN (H. DOC. NO. 525).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed and to lie on the table:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a communication from the Alien Property Custodian, submitting his annual report of the proceedings had under the trading with the enemy act for the year ended December 31, 1922.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1923.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

CONSTRUCTION OF RURAL POST ROADS IN COOPERATION WITH STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report concerning the appropriations for the construction of rural post roads in cooperation with the States, the Federal administration of this work, and the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within or only partly within the national forests, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

TRANSACTIONS OF EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on December 30 last I offered a resolution which is now lying upon the table. I exhibited it to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], this morning, and he said that much of the information asked for by the resolution had been supplied by the Shipping Board in various documents; that it was somewhat disconnected, but could be easily assembled by the Shipping Board. Some of the information, however, has not, in my opinion, been submitted in any form. My resolution asks for certain information; and, as I understand the Senator from Washington has no objection to the resolution, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the resolution be read, in order that we may see for what information it asks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution, consideration of which is asked by the junior Senator from Utah, will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 388), which had been submitted by Mr. KING December 30, 1922, as follows:

Resolved, That the Shipping Board is hereby directed to report to the Senate the names of all officers and employees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, together with a statement of the salary or compensation which is paid to each of them; a list of all persons who have received passes or gratuitous transportation on vessels operated by or for the account of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, with particulars as to the voyages made by such persons and the relations such persons have to the Shipping Board or to any of its officers or employees, together with a statement of the regular passage fares which would have been charged for such voyages; a statement of all charter parties, general or special, entered into for or on behalf of the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board since January 1, 1920, with particulars as to the vessels covered by such charter parties, the voyages made, cargo tons carried inbound and outbound, the amount of revenues received and the expense accounts allowed, together with a statement of all allowances for entertainments and the cost of any intoxicating liquors, and of all amounts of money paid under such charter parties, and to whom paid; a statement of all moneys which had been paid at any time for advertising, publicity, or propaganda; and a statement containing a complete list of all the vessels at any time owned or controlled by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the gross tonnage of every such vessel, the date of acquisition of every such vessel, the parties from whom such vessels were acquired, whether by contract for construction, requisition, or seizure, the amount of money paid for every such vessel, the amount of money spent upon every such vessel since acquisition, the disposition of every such vessel, and if sold or transferred, the amount of money received by the Shipping Board for such vessel, and a statement of the present status of every such vessel, giving its location and the use or service, if any, to which such vessel is subjected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask my colleague if it would not be better to eliminate from the resolution requests for information which is at this time in the possession of Congress? If the resolution shall not be framed in that manner, the information will again have to be printed, with all the expense incident to such printing; and that, in my opinion, will be unnecessary. There is no objection on my part to obtaining all of the information asked for by the resolution, but a great portion of it, and the portion which it will be costly to print, is already in our possession. I therefore thought perhaps my colleague could take the matter up with the Senator from Washington and eliminate that part of the resolution requesting information which we already have; and we might then adopt the resolution in such form as to call for the additional information, which it would not cost very much to print. There is, however, document after document which has already been printed in full in answer to some of the requests which are contained in the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am quite as anxious as is my colleague to avoid incurring any expense on the part of the Shipping Board or on the part of the Government. The only information that I feel sure is available—and I am not sure that that is absolutely accurate and complete—is that which relates to the number of ships which have been acquired and the number and tonnage of the ships which are now on hand. I am inclined to think that perhaps that information, or at least the latter part of it, as to the number of ships now on hand and the tonnage of each vessel, is not only available but has been published. So, if the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will assure me that that is a fact, I shall be perfectly willing to eliminate the request for that information from the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it struck me as I listened to the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] that the Senator from Texas had compiled very much of the information for which the junior Senator from Utah asks in the resolution. I remember distinctly that the Senator from Texas specified the number of ships, the cost of the ships, the ships that were sold, how much they were sold for, and all that sort of thing. I think that there is contained in the speech of the Senator from Texas a great deal of the information for which the resolution of the junior Senator from Utah calls. As the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has stated, I think much of this information has already been printed; but, as the junior Senator from Utah suggested a while ago, it is in different volumes, in different publications, and so on, and he would like to have it a compact document. I have no objection to the resolution, though it calls for much information that is already available. I will admit, however, that the information is scattered.

Mr. KING. Let me say to my colleague and to the chairman of the committee that when the resolution shall have been answered, if it shall be adopted, before any request is made by me to have it printed—and I do not know that such a request will be made; I do not anticipate having it printed at all; I want the information to aid me in submitting some remarks which I intend to offer upon the bill—but before it is printed, if any demand to that effect shall be made, I am entirely willing to go over it with the chairman of the committee and to strike out from any print the information which has already been printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hardly think that would be the proper way to proceed, because whenever a report is submitted it ought to be printed in full, and there is no right, I think, on the part of a committee to omit any portion of it and print only the remainder. All reports printed by the order of Congress are given numbers, just as every public document is given a number, and when such reports are submitted the department in which they are prepared adopts the number of the report which is given to it here when it is published as a public document. I think it would be rather confusing to have any portion of a report eliminated; but I have no objection, if the Senator wants to have the resolution adopted as it is, to that course being followed, and then, if in the Senator's opinion it shall really be necessary to have it printed, I will not have any objection to it being printed. The only object I had was to save expense that I thought was really unnecessary and could be avoided.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not complain at all at the position of my colleague; indeed, I quite approve of his interest in avoiding incurring obligations to a greater extent than is absolutely necessary. I do not quite agree with his view, though, that when information is submitted by any department and we order a part of the report printed, we must print it all. I think that is truly within the discretion of the Senate. If they find that any portion of the report should be printed, then they may order that portion printed, and the residue may be left upon the table or with the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say the Senate could not order that done, but I do not think that a committee could do so.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I said the committee, and not the Senate.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is right. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. As I understand, there is an appropriation bill ready for consideration which is likely to occupy considerable time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think we had better make the hour 12 o'clock. A recess will dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, no Senator is ready to go on this afternoon, and we are going to quit early. I do not think the Senator from Florida ought to object to the request. The appropriation will be pending and we would like to get that through.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not making the suggestion merely because I want further time, but I know that the Committee on Banking and Currency, for instance, is to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock, as they have been meeting every day recently at 10 o'clock, in the effort to report out a rural-credits measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator that I have been attending meetings of the Appropriations Committee both morning and afternoon to-day. We could get a quorum in the Senate in the morning and begin the consideration of the appropriation bill. There will be many Senators who probably will not care to be present when the appropriation bill is being considered; so that I think the committees will be able to proceed with their business. The Appropriations Committee will also meet in the morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to view the situation in that light, but there is this to be said about it, that if we have got to be here we can not be at work in the committee. I know there will be necessary only a few more days of work on the part of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am quite sure that committee is about finishing up its labors, and I do not believe there will be much more time required by it. I know, however, that the meeting to be held by the committee to-morrow will be a very important one, and I should dislike to be away from the session of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we meet at 11 o'clock that will give the committee an hour, and I doubt if there are very many members of that committee who will particularly care to be here while the appropriation bill is being considered. I hope the Senator will let us begin with the appropriation bill at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish very much the Senator would make that 12 o'clock. We are proceeding rapidly here. We are disposing of legislation fast. It will be only a little time before these appropriation bills will be passed, and I know that it is important that certain work go on that is being attended to by the committees. I do not believe we will save any time by meeting here at 11 o'clock, and I know that it will hamper that work. It is impossible to attend to it. I speak rather feelingly on the subject because I know the importance of this meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee at 10 o'clock to-morrow. We scarcely ever can be on hand at the minute. It may be 10 or 15 minutes after 10 o'clock before we get started, and if then we have to be here by 11 o'clock we might as well not have any meeting of the committee at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator think the Committee on Banking and Currency will pretty well conclude its important work to-morrow morning?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so. I think to-morrow morning is the important session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, on that statement, I will change my request to a request for a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that. I could go on this afternoon, of course, but I would not much more than make a start.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not suppose we would gain anything by forcing the Senator to go on this afternoon. It is desired that we have a brief executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is ordered that when the Senate concludes its session to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I introduced this morning a bill to provide for a commission in connection with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, to determine scientifically the per cent of alcohol in a beverage which renders that beverage intoxicating. Concerning that bill I wish to make a few remarks at this time.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill which I introduced this morning may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 4269) to create a commission of investigation in connection with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission of seven persons, of whom at least two shall be women, who in his judgment are qualified to investigate and determine as far as possible what alcoholic content in a beverage, under a fair and reasonable interpretation, makes the beverage intoxicating.

SEC. 2. That members of the commission shall each be paid a compensation of $750 a month. The expenses of the commission for such accommodation and equipment and clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as they may feel necessary shall be paid for out of the moneys herein appropriated on the certification of the chairman or acting chairman that the same are necessary, and that such amount paid is fair and reasonable, and that the services for which compensation has been paid or materials for which payments have been made have been actually furnished.

SEC. 3. The commission is hereby given power to summon witnesses and to secure information and to conduct experiments and to administer oaths by any member of the commission as may enable it to report its findings as soon as possible under the terms of this act.

SEC. 4. The Federal courts of the United States are hereby directed to enforce such subpœna or subpœna duces tecum, or such other order or information as the commission may under this act properly issue, and to punish as for contempt of court any failure of any person to respond to such orders of the commission, and any person testifying falsely or giving false information shall be guilty of and punished for the same offense as if such act had been committed in the trial of a case before the Federal court.

SEC. 5. The commission shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall give such assistance from the Department of Agriculture as he may be able to furnish, and he himself shall be ex officio member of the commission in addition to the seven members herein provided.

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 to carry out the purpose of this act.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the proposed legislation to scientifically determine what per cent of alcohol makes a beverage intoxicating is intended to be a step in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and to solidify the ranks of those who believe in its enforcement. An increasing number of Americans who do believe in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as they believe in the enforcement of all other provisions of law in this country—and in loyalty to our country and confidence in her future there is no other course to follow—are cooperating and voting with those who do not believe in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and who are striving in every way to weaken its power and to increase disrespect for it and disobedience of its provisions.

This unfortunate and unnatural alliance is occasioned by the belief in the minds of many that the so-called Volstead law—which is the bill passed by Congress to enforce the eighteenth amendment—is unnecessarily restrictive of personal liberty, and interferes in an unwarranted degree with the rights of the individual. Wherever this belief is well founded the law ought to be changed, for it is fundamental in our Government that laws—all of which must be enforced and obeyed—ought to be enforced with as little interference with the liberties of citizens as possible.

Restrictive provisions should be the minimum necessary to secure the law's full enforcement, and not the maximum. The wise policy is not to regulate the habits or actions of individuals more than is necessary to accomplish the full enforcement of existing law.

Just in proportion as unnecessary regulation is insisted upon there is encouraged a spirit of discontent and resentment which tends to lawlessness.

If the eighteenth amendment would be better enforced with less restriction than is provided in the Volstead law, then by all means the restrictive features ought to be changed. If it is not necessary to prohibit any beverage which has more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol in order to enforce the prohibition against all intoxicating liquors, then it is most unwise to insist upon such an arbitrary and unnecessarily small per cent of alcohol.

Chemists tell me that there is very often more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol in buttermilk, and no one will seriously contend that buttermilk is intoxicating. The purpose of the proposed bill is to determine in a fair and scientific manner, as far as human investigation can determine the question, what amount of alcohol does, in fact, make a beverage intoxicating. It is information which ought to be available.

Obviously, an investigation conducted by those whose inclinations are strongly wet, or an investigation conducted by those whose inclinations are strongly dry, can not create the same confidence in the result of the investigation as would follow an impartial, scientific, governmental inquiry into the matter. I can see nothing but good from such an investigation, nor can I see any substantial reason why there should be any opposition to such a measure. It will tend to satisfy the discontent of tens of thousands who believe that the present enforcement law was enacted with unwarranted restrictions, and whose dissatisfaction would vanish, or at least substantially lessen, if they were satisfied that the law of the land was not more restrictive than of necessity it had to be in order to enforce the eighteenth amendment.

No intoxicating beverages can be lawfully made or sold or transported under the provisions of that amendment. This is the fixed law of the land. Those who wish the return of intoxicating beverages into American life, whether with or without the saloon, must recognize the existence of this constitutional prohibition which stands immovably in the way. There will be no change in its provisions. It is not only engrafted into the fundamental law of the land, but it is in entire conformity with the judgment and desire of an overwhelming majority of the American people. In a large number of States there are provisions of State law which are fully as restrictive and in many cases more restrictive than the so-called Volstead law. This is not unusual in our dual form of government. So far as the Federal Government is concerned, considering as it does the country as a whole, and recognizing the sentiment in Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York, as well as in Missouri, Kansas, California, Maine, and Florida, it should enact only such general Federal legislation as will without doubt enforce the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, but with as little restriction upon the rights and actions and habits of the people as is possible.

This is the only safe foundation for the Federal law, and it leaves the way entirely open to separate States to make their own law, which may be more strict if they so desire, but can not be less strict.

The Federal law should be the minimum of necessary restriction. No State can require less than the Federal law provides. No State can open the door any wider than is permissible under Federal legislation, but every State under the provisions of the Constitution may make its enforcement law more strict, if it so desires, than the Federal law, in order to meet the conditions of its own locality and the wishes of its own people. From whatever standpoint the question is viewed, the great outstanding fact before the American people is this—that the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution is here, and here to stay, and that its full enforcement is an absolute necessity not only because of itself but because of that general respect for law and obedience to its provisions which is the corner stone of the Republic.

Lawlessness along any single line breeds with malignant germ lawlessness along many another line; and when once a people come to believe that they can with impunity defy an existing law the first great step has been taken toward universal anarchy and lawlessness.

The proposed bill is but a single step. It may well be improved as other minds come to consider it. It is in no sense the final word, but it will in some degree, in my judgment, tend to lessen the general discontent and strengthen the legitimate enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

ADDRESS BY NORMAN H. DAVIS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, an address delivered by Hon. Norman H. Davis, former Undersecretary of State, before the Democratic Women's Luncheon Club, of Philadelphia, on the fundamental differences between the Democratic and the Republican Parties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

FUNDAMENTAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE DEMOCRATIC AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTIES.

[Address delivered by Hon. Norman H. Davis before the Democratic Women's Luncheon Club, Philadelphia.]

The welfare of this Nation is in the keeping of its citizens, in whom all sovereignty rests. Our moral and material progress depends upon the wise exercise by the people of their sovereign powers, and that must, in the last analysis, be governed by the character, intelligence, and sense of duty with which the people approach the problems that are constantly demanding solution. We can not have a government of the people, by the people, and for the people if the majority of the people step aside and let an active minority, with some special interest to serve, elect their representatives and direct the destinies of the Nation. There has been a dangerous and growing tendency on the part of eligible voters to hold aloof and take no interest whatever in public questions. In the last presidential election only about half of those entitled to vote went to the polls. This is no doubt due in part to a lack of interest and sense of public duty, and also to a failure to distinguish any marked difference between the contending political parties. There is, however, a most gratifying indication that the women desire to get an intelligent grasp of public questions and to fulfill their duties of citizenship, but it is not always easy to get at facts and at the truth. This requires thought, and also freedom from prejudices which obstruct thought and obscure the truth. Therein lie the chief obstacles, because as a rule we do hate to think and we do cherish our prejudices. Nevertheless, if we are to progress as a people and enjoy the benefits of a highly developed democracy, we must have a sincere desire for truth and a constant sense of obligation to discharge with courage our responsibility as citizens.

Political parties perform a necessary function in our governmental system. They offer the only practicable means by which the will of the people can be expressed and enforced. It is therefore important to align ourselves with the party which more nearly represents the principles and policies in which we believe and to support and encourage it in the advancement of those principles. Every year vast multitudes of new voters are called upon to determine what their party affiliation shall be, and that is not always easy, because the party platforms more often confuse than aid them in making a choice. At times it is very difficult for a conscientious person to look above the struggle of parties and the contests between their respective candidates and see what each party stands for and what may be the essential differences between them. As a result many in disgust give up attempts to fathom political complexities and then either lose interest in public questions or allow social pressure or inherited prejudices rather than conviction to determine their party loyalty.

The original purpose of party platforms—a custom instituted by Andrew Jackson—was to inform the voters what specific principles and policies the party advocated. As some one has very aptly stated, "Platforms are now made to run on but not to stand on." The party platform is now often drafted with a view of reconciling conflicting views and preventing a split within the party, and is filled with platitudes which it is hoped will at least not alienate votes. This occurs when there is not an outstanding issue or when there is not a unity of view within the party on important issues, and when those holding conflicting views are willing to subordinate them to party success. A typical instance was the Republican platform of 1920. That was a great feat. It enabled those who were unalterably opposed to our entrance into the League of Nations to work for the election of the Republican ticket with those who were ardent advocates of our entrance into the league. It enabled Mr. Harding to hold the antileaguers in one hand, the proleaguers in the other, and to lead them all with a smile right on to the White House. Some of those who strongly favored our entrance into the league became skeptical and required some reassurance. They could not get it from the platform or from the candidate, but at this juncture 31 prominent Republicans came to the rescue. They not only professed their profound faith in the league and the conviction that we should and must enter it, but assumed the solemn moral responsibility of speaking for Mr. Harding and of assuring the American people in an open letter that his election would insure our taking the course which they, with such wisdom, advocated. Mr. Harding was elected, but we have not entered the league nor has the President made any apparent attempt to enter or to form another association of nations, about which he made several allusions. Obviously, these 31 gentlemen were misled and others were misled by them.

The last Republican platform, for the first time in over a generation, gave no indication of any intention to impose a higher protective tariff and it did not declare in favor of ship subsidies. Nevertheless the Republican Party has already built for us the highest tariff wall known in history and a special session of Congress is to be called, so we are told, for the purpose of putting through a proposed bill which provides for the sale of the Government ships and the subsequent payment in subsidies to the purchasers of about four times as much as they will pay for the ships.

I merely cite these facts as an instance of how dangerous it may be to rely alone upon a platform or upon representations of a faction within a party. The question which naturally arises is how can one best secure facts and information which will enable him to determine his party affiliations? The only satisfactory way is to study the history of the parties; the conditions and issues which brought them into existence, the ideals, principles, and interests which have influenced their actions in the past; and the sympathies, tendencies, and influences which at present seem to dominate them. Only thus can we hope to fathom how a party will react to a particular problem and attempt to solve it.

Political parties originate through the association of a large number of people having deep convictions and similar views on some particular questions which at the time may be considered vital issues. The life of a party depends to a great extent upon the life and importance of the issues which may have brought it into existence, or, in case those issues become obsolete, upon the position it takes on other issues which may develop.

The Democratic Party, which was founded by Thomas Jefferson, is the oldest political party in existence. Although some of the moral and legal precepts and main theories of government, the application of which served as the motive power in its formation, have become universally accepted by all parties and are no longer issues in controversy, the Democratic Party has continued its long existence by advocating with few exceptions the application to new or changing problems of the same fundamental principles to which its founders and leaders have held. Now that the theories of democratic government and human relationships which Jefferson advocated have been accepted, it is rather difficult to understand why, just a century and a quarter ago, there should have been such marked differences of opinion and bitter controversies over their acceptance and application.

Since the formation of our Government there have been certain well-defined periods—including the present one—in our political, social, and economic affairs which have created a new set of problems, and in practically every instance the Democratic Party has led the way in advocating the measures in which solutions have been found. This party had its origin during the first of these periods, when it led in the great movement to revive the spirit and ideals of the American Revolution. After the Revolution there was a decline in the ideals for which our forefathers had fought and during the period of the Confederation there was a considerable social ferment which showed a tendency on the part of many to think that liberty meant license. As a result, the majority of those who drafted the Constitution were reluctant or afraid to apply the theories embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Our historical records show that some of our very greatest patriots who were instrumental in drafting the Constitution were frankly outspoken in their fear of or objection to a government by the people. This was to be the first great experiment in constitutional democracy, and it was most natural that there should have been considerable doubt on the part of conservative thinkers as to the wisdom of giving the people too much control in the Government. The Constitution was therefore very carefully drawn up with a view of establishing a carefully concentrated rather than a vaguely dispersed responsibility, which makes it all the more important that those who are to have such responsibility shall be guided by sound principles. The people were permitted to vote only for Representatives in the Lower House of Congress, and it was never intended that they should elect the President or Senators by direct vote.

The first great conflict between those who believed in a representative democracy and those who believed more in an aristocracy came over the adoption of the Constitution. In this fight Thomas Jefferson and his associates forced the adoption of the Bill of Rights as a part of the Constitution, which was subsequently embodied in the first 10 amendments, and defined the fundamental principles of Democracy.

Those who composed the Federalist Party were opposed to most of the theories and principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence. They not only believed that the aristocrats should run the Government but also that they should do so primarily for the benefit of their class; that only property holders could vote and only those with considerable property could hold public office. Thomas Jefferson, who wrote that immortal document, had very deep convictions to the contrary. The Democratic Party therefore came into existence and into power as a result of the controversy over the application of these principles. The party founded by Jefferson was at first called Democratic-Republican, but subsequently Democratic. The Democratic-Republicans were first called Democrats by the Federalists as an opprobrium to those who could advocate such radical and progressive theories. In his first inaugural address Jefferson defined the issues then in controversy, the principles of Democracy, and the theories of Government which he advocated. While Jefferson could not under the then prevailing conditions give full application to all of these theories, he made much progress in doing so and left an indelible impression on future political thought and molded to an incredible extent the form and character of our Government.

Although Jefferson and his chief party associates were men of high birth and cultivation, they believed that the Government should be conducted for the benefit of the masses and that the people should be given more voice in it. Jefferson established the rule that presidential electors should register the will of the people. He was opposed to slavery, but public opinion was then indifferent to it.

The Democrats believed that a strong government must be built from the foundations up. They therefore advocated the greatest degree of local self-government, State rights, and the extension of free public education, realizing that since sovereignty should rest in the people the people must be educated in order to exercise their power wisely.

The Jeffersonian Democrats were in control of the Government for 25 years. They accomplished much toward applying their theories, but in the course of time there developed a tendency toward Government bureaucracy and the people were not given as much voice in government as they were beginning to demand. With the opening up of the West and its rapid development and expanding spirit of freedom a new and powerful impetus was given to Democracy. A strong demand came from the West for a more extensive application of the Democratic principles, local self-government, and education. In the East the small farmers and laborers began to demand their rights. It was a period of "Democratic ferment" and likewise our greatest period of literature. It witnessed the first labor movement in this country, the principal demands of which were that hours of labor should be reduced from 12 to 10 hours, that children from 6 to 16 years of age should not be permitted to work in factories, and that public schools should be established for their education.

Andrew Jackson, who was a typical product of this new Democratic spirit, was elected President in 1832. It is only now that we are beginning to get histories which are sufficiently devoid of prejudice to give a correct account of the great social and political movement headed by Jackson. The franchise was extended and thereafter based on "manhood" rather than on "property." Andrew Jackson's greatest contribution was to make our Government responsive to the will of the people and to strengthen the principles of national unity. He was a strong advocate of local self-government and State rights, but he was opposed to an abuse of the principle of State rights. As it has been aptly said, Jefferson established a Government of the people and for the people and Jackson completed the process by making it a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

After the death of Jackson party spirit became weakened. The welfare of the Nation as a whole became subordinated to sectional issues, involving a divergence of opinion and of interest regarding slavery and the tariff, which caused a rift in political alignments. For a long time there had been a conflict of interest between the agricultural and manufacturing districts of the country over the tariff, but political parties had not been divided over it. However, the tariff and State rights became indirectly involved in the controversy which arose over the extension of slavery to the new States. Some students now hold that these questions could have been settled without war had there not been a weakening in party spirit. Others think that party lines were probably weakened because of the apparent differences in material interest.

Slavery finally became a moral issue, and the Republican Party was organized in 1854 by those who were opposed to the extension of slavery. Tariff protection did not, however, then become a political issue, as is generally supposed; nor did it become the principal tenet of the Republican Party until 1872.

Abraham Lincoln and certain other practical statesmen who later gave their support to the Republican Party were actuated by high ideals. Strange as it may now seem, the so-called vested interests in the East were bitterly opposed to this new party, which they considered most radical and revolutionary. Since the principal issue upon which the Republican Party had been formed was slavery, the party was without an issue for some years after the abolition of slavery and stood only on its war record until 1872, when it declared for a protective tariff.

After the war there began an unprecedented development in industries and railroads. Those who led in this development gradually became more attached to the Republican Party and finally supported it in exchange for its paternalistic aid to them through the tariff and other legislation. As the reaction and passions resulting from the Civil War subsided public opinion became aroused at the injustices and blunders which were committed during the reconstruction period and demanded a Government which would act for the good of the Nation as a whole.

Discontent at the abuse of those in power increased, and in 1884 Grover Cleveland was nominated by the Democratic Party and elected President on a platform which demanded the establishment of an extensive civil service, reforms in governmental administration, and radical financial reforms. Cleveland did much to extend the civil service and to eradicate the barriers of sectionalism which had been left by the war. In keeping with the principles of the Democratic Party, which had always been opposed to legislative measures passed for the benefit of certain classes at the expense of others, he opposed the protective tariff, but was unable to get very important reductions in the tariff rates.

The injustices of the tariff, the abuses in the industrial field, and the ill effects of the unsound and unscientific banking and currency system which had been adopted after the Civil War were becoming very burdensome. Before sufficient constructive measures could be adopted to alleviate the situation, hard times and discontent among the agricultural interests developed in the Middle West, and the farmers joined in a movement which brought into existence the Populist Party. Failing to diagnose the basic cause of the troubles, relief was sought through a change in the monetary standard, and in the campaign of 1896 this became the political issue. In this campaign many Democrats supported McKinley. This monetary question was finally taken out of the realm of politics.

With the beginning of this century a new spirit, with a new type of statesmanship, was born. During the latter part of McKinley's administration a divergence of views within the Republican Party began to develop. Public hostility to the power or abuses of large business combinations and to the subservience of the Government to selfish interests increased until there was a split within the Republican Party between the Progressives, headed by Theodore Roosevelt, and the so-called standpatters. The Progressives rendered a great service in pointing out the necessity for reform, but they were unable to secure and retain control of the party, and the independent voters began to look to the Democratic Party to lead in the reforms which public opinion demanded.

Woodrow Wilson was elected President in 1912 upon a platform which promised to revise the tariff downward, to establish a sound banking and currency system under the supervision and control of the Government, and other measures which would set the industrial and economic forces free. Through the lowering of the tariff, further extension of the civil-service system, improvement in industrial relations, and the organization of a complete and constructive banking and currency system, practically all of the campaign pledges were redeemed during the first two years preceding the outbreak of the World War. There has not been another such period of constructive legislation.

Both political parties had been in favor of a bank of issue, with a new system of currency, but had different views of how it should be established. The Republicans favored one central bank of issue, to be owned and controlled by private interests, with branches in other parts of the country. The Democrats held that an institution with such power should be controlled by the Government and operated in conjunction with the banking interests. They also favored a decentralized system, in order that each economic section of the country should have its own bank of issue, which banks should form part of one general system, with a board of supervision in Washington. There was at the time considerable opposition to the plan which was adopted, but its subsequent success destroyed all criticism and it is now pronounced by the foremost financial students of the world as the most perfect and constructive financial system which has yet been devised. We little knew at the time when this constructive financial measure was taken how very imperative it was, because, had it not been for our Federal reserve system, we should not have been able to stand as we did the strains of the World War in which we were soon to be involved.

During the century and a half in which the people of the United States have been working out their destiny under a constitutional democracy the Democratic Party has, with the exception of the Civil War period, taken the lead in every important political, social, and industrial reform and development and contiguous territorial expansion. When the World War came inequalities and injustices still existed within this Nation in the economic field because of discrimination through the tariff, but equal political and civil rights had been to a great extent secured to individuals and we had learned to settle our domestic controversies by peaceful processes. The war gave us an entirely new set of problems, as to which it took considerable time to crystallize public opinion. Just as those seeking material advantages for themselves have caused conflicts within a nation by disregarding and abusing the rights and interests of others, so had nations, actuated by similar selfish ambitions, disregarded the rights of other nations and brought on the World War. As the war progressed it became more apparent that the ground gained through the long struggle for individual freedom was endangered and could not be held unless the freedom of nations was safeguarded.

In America we had been leading what we thought to be an isolated existence, free from any foreign entanglements. Developments soon showed us that we were inextricably and unalterably entangled. We had not been able to grasp the significance of this great scientific and industrial age in which time and space had been practically eliminated by the improvements in communication and transportation, and how interdependent politically and economically had become world affairs. The derangement brought about by the war shocked us into thought and action. To those who gave much consideration to the problems which arose it became evident that the conflict had been caused by blind, selfish, aggressive national policies, based upon false moral and economic theories, which ignored the rights and interests of others and the welfare of the world as a whole. Since the world had become an economic unit, it became obvious that it must become a political unit, at least to the extent of applying a common international code of laws and morals which would give stability, insure justice, and keep open the channels of trade and commerce.

In the beginning of our struggle for national freedom and self-government the founder of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, wrote the declaration of the rights of man, which defined the aspirations of our forefathers and which served as an inspiration to them in their struggle for independence and subsequently as the foundation for this Government. It now became obvious that these same principles upon which individual liberty was based and the same rules of conduct which had been worked out for individuals within a nation should be accepted and applied by the nations in their relations with one another.

Gradually the fact was borne in upon us that as a consequence of the economic and political transformation within the last half century our national freedom and material welfare could be jeopardized by conflicts between other nations, brought o. by conditions not of our making and practices alien to us. It was then that another great American and leader of the Democratic Party, Woodrow Wilson, crystallized and gave expression to the aspirations of all the liberal forces of mankind who were seeking an improvement in world affairs. His solution was simple and purely American. He merely proposed to take the same fundamentals of the rights of man which had served as the foundation of our Government and apply them to nations, and to take the same rules of conduct which have guided us in our relations with nations, making them a law unto all nations, doing away with the idea of privilege as between nations, bringing all nations, big or small, forward or backward, upon an equal status before the law with equal right of protection if weak and with equal observation of the law if strong.

Unfortunately, the stress of war had been too great, and when hostilities ceased these principles were for the time being obscured and overcome by reaction to personal and national selfishness, and the same evil and blind forces of greed which had caused the great conflict again became predominant. What happened is still too fresh in the memory of everyone to require recapitulation. I merely suggest that you consider for a moment what brought on this conflict which almost destroyed civilization, and ask yourselves what we have done to repair the ravages of that war and to prevent such a recurrence, and what assurance we have, if any, which we did not have before for the future peace, stability, and prosperity of the world.

We are confronted to-day with conditions which threaten the peace of the world and with obstacles which are preventing the return of prosperity. In Europe we find a continent economically prostrate, with bankrupt governments, depreciated currencies, and a serious contraction in purchasing power. We find deeply embedded prejudices, fears, and selfish ambitions (such as those which led to the war and drew us in), which are preventing the return of prosperity and the stabilization of peace, and we find that the Turk is coming back into Europe. In the United States we see our exports constantly dwindling, we find our ships idle, we witness serious industrial conflicts, we see a growing movement of discontent in the agricultural districts, and we feel the excessive burdens of taxation.

Now, what steps has the Republican Party taken or proposed for coping with such a situation and preventing another war? Isolation, a still higher protective tariff wall, and ship subsidies, with their added financial burdens! The Republicans were most eager to get into power in order to reduce taxes and the cost of living, but when they have a chance they proceed to increase both by providing us with the most vicious protective tariff in our history. They were eager to stabilize exchange, to stimulate foreign trade, and to put our idle ships to work, and yet under the pressure of special interests to which they are indebted they took steps which prevent any such relief. The amusing discovery was made that if America had possessed a large mercantile marine it would have prevented the war. The administration is therefore advocating a ship subsidy in order to maintain our mercantile marine and prevent future wars. Disinterested students are unable to see how ships can be operated successfully unless the world is at work and unless there is a movement of goods inward as well as outward, and they are unable to see how a subsidy would create such cargoes.

This administration was willing to make all sorts of concessions and commitments for peace in the Far East but refused to do anything of the kind in Europe where peace is more threatened and where there is more at stake. Our present policy toward Europe seems to be one of holding aloof and allowing all sorts of calamities and atrocities to take place and then to send relief to the victims. If that is all we have learned from our experience in the war and if we have no more concern than that about what takes place in Europe, then obviously we made a terrible blunder when we entered the war.

The Republican Party has in the last two years proved its inability to cope with either the international or the domestic problems with which we are confronted. This party is still wedded to false economic theories and dominated by selfish interests which prevent it from adopting measures which will permit a healthy economic recovery, and there is a conflict of view within the party which prevents it from adopting a constructive course which will assist in the stabilization of world peace, upon which our own welfare depends. The course which the Republican Party has taken has not only added to the difficulties of the situation in Europe but it has accentuated those in the United States.

In their different approach to these problems there has never been a more striking illustration of the difference in the influences and principles which guide the actions and mold the policies of the two great political parties. Some of the most able and progressive members of the Republican Party are opposed to the policy of isolation and are not in sympathy with the tariff policy of their party, but unfortunately they are not exercising any effective influence on party action. It is becoming more evident that the only hope lies in the Democratic Party and that if we are to have a solution it must come through a broader outlook on world affairs and the application of the political and economic theories held by the Democratic Party. Broadly speaking, the Democratic Party believes that each individual is entitled to equal rights and advantages. It is opposed to privilege for individuals as well as for nations. It is opposed to class legislation or to any policies which violate that principle by giving to any group of citizens aid, protection, or privileges which may be detrimental to the rights and interests of others and to the country as a whole. In keeping with this basic principle it is and always has been opposed to a tariff except for revenue purposes.

A tariff adds an artificial price to the protected article which is taken from the pocket of the consumer and put into that of the producer. This is not only unfair but the doubtful benefit to the producer is not sufficient to justify exacting from the consumers a bounty for the protection of articles which they could otherwise get cheaper. This practice starts a vicious circle of artificial prices which adds to the entire cost of living and also gets industries on such an artificial basis with consequent high costs of production that they can not in normal times compete successfully in foreign markets.

This practice of granting bounties to certain groups at the expense of other groups will inevitably lead to a demand by the unprotected groups for equalization of benefits and other Government aid which will ultimately lead to socialism or to the cessation of such preferential legislation.

Protection is destroying the morale and weakening our economic structure. It was originally imposed to foster infant industries and to protect them until they could get strong enough to stand and walk alone. Instead of strengthening them, it has had the reverse effect. Instead of growing stronger and requiring less charity, the protected industries, according to their own spokesmen, are growing weaker and requiring more nourishment. There is not an instance in our tariff history where the protected interests have acknowledged their growth to manhood and their ability to survive on their own efforts and efficiency. On the contrary, they have become so weak and inefficient, according to their own claims, that they have recently induced the Government to pass the hat around and take up, by means of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, a forced collection from the tax-burdened masses to the amount of at least $6,000,000,000 per annum for the benefit of these industrial paupers.

As long as we were a debtor nation and not dependent upon foreign markets for the full employment of our laborers and the export of manufactured products without competition, we could follow unsound economic practices. We can not continue this now. As a result of the war we have become a creditor nation with surplus manufactured articles and farm products to export and a large mercantile marine to employ. We also have surplus capital, the export of which could be used to the great advantage of the world as well as of ourselves, provided it can be safely invested. But can you imagine how we can find purchasers for our surplus products, safe investments for our surplus capital, and employment for our ships unless the rest of the world is producing and selling its products? And can you believe after the experience we have just had that this can be done unless far-reaching measures are taken by all the principal powers, including the United States, to improve international relations and to cooperate in the adoption of political measures which will stabilize peace and set the economic forces free?

AMENDMENT OF PITTMAN ACT.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for appropriate reference. I am not sure whether it should go to the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the title of the bill be read.

The bill (S. 4277) to amend the act entitled "An act to conserve the gold supply of the United States, to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States, to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use, to assist foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States, and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver," approved April 23, 1918, was read twice by its title.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that it is an amendment of the Pittman Act. I am not sure whether that act was considered by the Finance Committee or by the Banking and Currency Committee. My recollection is that it was considered by the Finance Committee.

Mr. CURTIS. I should think, from the reading of the title, that the bill should go to the Committee on Finance; but there are some matters covered by it that would be under the jurisdiction of other committees.

Mr. KING. Technically, it ought to go to the Committee on Mines and Mining; but my recollection is that the so-called Pittman Act came from the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the committee that had the original bill, which, the Chair is informed, is the Committee on Banking and Currency.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 5, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 4 (legislative day of January 3), 1923.

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The following-named passed assistant surgeons to be surgeons in the United Public Health Service, to rank as such from the dates set opposite their names:

Roscoe R. Spencer, January 5, 1923.

UTAH.

George M. Jones, Richfield.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 4, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, we thank Thee that Thou art the Father of the brotherhood of mankind. We bless Thee that there is a power, not of ourselves, that makes for righteousness. May this great realm of truth fill us with abiding and increasing hope and courage. Put us all in harmony with the good, the true, and the spiritual in Thy universe. Teach us with growing emphasis that the art of successful living is not in making our own way but in building true manhood for God and our beloved country. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks on the resolution proposing a constitutional amendment relative to tax-exempt securities, for the purpose of printing a letter on the subject which I have received from Robert M. Hughes, Esq., of Norfolk, Va., who is a lawyer and writer of unusual ability and distinction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NORFOLK, VA., January 2, 1923.

Hon. R. WALTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to thank you for sending me in response to my request a copy of H. J. Res. 314, in relation to the reciprocal right of the Government and the States to tax each other's securities.

A careful study of it confirms me in the opinion that it should not pass, and I will take the liberty of giving you my views on the subject for what they may be worth.

As you know, I am a life-long Republican, but I do not think this question should be treated from a party standpoint, even though the administration should be back of it. I think it a high tribute to the present Congress that they are dividing on questions like this.

My first objection is that the proposed amendment if passed will tend to break down the mutual independence of State and Nation. I am enough of an old fogy to believe that each should work in its proper sphere without interference from the other.

Fiske, in his American Political Ideas (p. 133), says:

"Stated broadly, so as to acquire somewhat the force of a universal proposition, the principle of federalism is just this: That the people of a State shall have full and entire control of their own domestic affairs which directly concern them only and which they will naturally manage with more intelligence and zeal than any distant governing body can possibly exercise; but that as regards matters of common concern between a group of States a decision shall in every case be reached not by brutal warfare or weary diplomacy but by the systematic legislation of a central Government which represents both States and people."

In his Critical Period of American History he says:

"If the day should ever arrive (which God forbid) when the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects sent from Washington, and when the self-government of the States shall have been so far lost as that of the departments of France, or even so far as the counties of England, on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end, and the hopes that have been built upon it for the future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever" (p. 238).

In Collector v. Day (11 Wall., U. S. 113, 124) Mr. Justice Nelson, of New York, said:

"The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the latter within the limits of the powers not granted, or in the language of the tenth amendment 'reserved' are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States."

The proposed amendment substantially provides that the National Government may tax the income of State securities, provided that it lay the same tax on the income of national securities; and conversely that the States may tax the income of national securities, provided it lay the same tax on the income of State securities. In other words, the idea seems to be, that the best way to preserve the mutual independence of our two governments is to make them mutually dependent.

I can not imagine a greater firebrand than such a provision. It invites endless tax wars between State and Nation. We are all familiar with Marshall's famous statement that the power to tax is the power to destroy. No mortal can say whether the State or the Nation would be most imperiled. In the past the Nation has almost invariably triumphed in contests with a State. This provision, even if not acted on by Congress after its insertion in the Constitution, would destroy the market for State and municipal securities and prevent their issue in great emergencies for the most necessary purposes. The liability to taxation would have this effect, even though the right to tax was not exercised.

Suppose that such an amendment had been in force at the time of the Galveston storm or the San Francisco earthquake. Could those cities have negotiated any bonds, except at ruinous rates of interest?

But circumstances might arise in which the right of a State to tax the income of national securities would be equally disastrous. Suppose that we should become involved in a war which was unpopular in the wealthy States, or what might be called the creditor States. The obligation to tax their State issues would have small effect with them in comparison with a national loan. The legislatures of such States could break up the sale of Government securities within their States by the imposition of a heavy tax on their income.

This is no hypothetical case. It is a fact of history that the New England States were violently opposed to the War of 1812, which they called "Mr. Madison's War," and went to the verge of secession on its account. It is equally well known that many States were opposed to the Mexican War, which they looked upon as an attempt to extend the slave-holding area. In the World War it was stated in many newspapers that some of the States with large German populations were not in sympathy with the war. Whether the statement was true or not, I do not know; but the fact is that the State debts of Missouri and Wisconsin are small, and would not be considered if the right were given to tax Federal bonds.

We can not say now whether the national debt will be paid off rapidly, as in the past, or not. If we branch into Government ownership, we know that it will not be. Where will the advocates of Government ownership float the bonds which they will have to issue in payment of mines, railroads, or other properties which they classify under the name of Government utilities?

If two sovereignties have a mutual power of mischief, history proves that they will exercise it. We have but to recall the tariff war between New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut which contributed so largely to the adoption of the Constitution.

Those States were bound together by the most sacred ties and had just emerged from a devastating war of six years' duration which they had fought shoulder to shoulder. And yet the power of mutual mischief almost made them fly at each other's throats. In view of this experience, how can we wonder at the differences among the allies of the recent war? And how can we avoid the conclusion that such a measure as the one proposed may result in similar quarrels between the Nation and the separate States?

My next objection is that such a measure would act as a preferential tariff in favor of foreign securities and against our own.

The foreign outlook may be discouraging, but it is hardly more so than at previous periods following long and destructive wars. It is but a matter of time, whether near or distant, before the principal European nations will get on their feet and resume their productiveness. Their securities will pay high interest rates and will take much capital abroad which would remain at home if allowed the opportunity. Our public securities, if taxable, would lose their attractiveness and, at least in part, their safety.

My next objection is that it would discourage saving by the small investor. The financial strength of France, due to the desire of every peasant to own a few of the rentes, is well known. Our bonds should continue to be issued in small denominations as well as in large, and the people of limited means should be encouraged to purchase them and hold them for a rainy day. They are really contributing taxes indirectly, for the Government or State, as the case may be, gets its taxes in its saving of interest. To deny him this opportunity is to make him the victim of "blue sky" promoters, for men of that class are not easily persuaded to invest in industrial bonds or stocks, which are usually in denominations too large to be available.

My next objection, and a most vital one, is that the proposed amendment makes no provision for primary and successive renewals of outstanding public obligations.

It does provide only for "securities issued after the ratification of this article," thereby, of course, excluding those now outstanding. But it would in terms cover renewals.

To make renewals subject to tax would bankrupt half the cities in the United States. No growing city pays off its debt, but always expects to renew it. I understand that the debt of New York City is over $1,500,000,000. To make its renewals subject to national taxation would involve a ruinous interest rate, for the possibility of taxation affects the marketability of bonds only less than the actual imposition of the tax.

In the last few years the States have had the road-bond craze and the General Government, so far from discouraging it, has stimulated it by the bait of Federal appropriations.

When pay day rolls around on those bonds, what rate of interest will the States have to pay for their renewals?

My next objection is that it will not, in my judgment, result in driving money into industrial securities, as predicted by its advocates.

The decline in the value of public utilities and industrial securities began before the late war and before the large increase in public securities, State and National. It was due to hostile legislation, State and Federal, such as the creation of various boards and commissions with extensive powers of regulation. Other illustrations are the employer liability acts, the workmen's compensation acts, the child labor laws, and the many statutes regulating hours and methods of work. I do not mean to criticize this legislation, for I favored much of it. But its most ardent advocates can not deny that it has greatly increased the proportion of expenses to gross receipts and correspondingly diminished the returns from industrial investments. Another illustration of these growing liabilities is the increased amounts of verdicts. I can remember when a verdict for $5,000 in a personal-injury case was thought a large one, even where the injury was serious. It should be our policy to encourage the formation of small corporations rather than large ones. That is a cardinal object of the Sherman Act; but a small corporation may be put out of business by some of these recent verdicts.

Legislation can not drive capital into investments that it distrusts. It may be driven into lock boxes and old socks or into foreign channels, but that is the only result of such measures.

We see this partially illustrated already. In spite of the fact that many of our industries are languishing, Dutch loans, Brazilian loans, Argentine loans, Swiss loans, and many others have been floated in this country and taken up by investors in preference to local bonds. The proposed amendment will aggravate matters by extending to our public securities the same distrust that is now felt for our corporate securities, thereby driving additional American capital abroad.

My next objection is that it would stimulate the spirit of intolerance and suspicion now so prevalent.

The essentials of an ideal democracy are supposed to be liberty, equality, and fraternity. We have plenty of the two first, but the last seems to have disappeared. Our nerves are apparently on the raw, and no one is willing to credit the other with proper motives.

This is forcibly illustrated in the history of public securities. During the drives to float the Government bonds the public buildings were plastered over with flaming posters urging upon those who could not go to the front that it was a patriotic duty to buy bonds, and banks were advised to extend special accommodation to those who had to borrow for the purpose. Mass meetings were called, speakers sent to all the theaters, and the influence of business organizations invoked. The tax exemption feature was specially stressed, and in this manner the Government placed its bonds at an interest rate that more than counterbalanced any tax receipts that otherwise might have been possible.

The investor was a patriot until he parted with his money, but as soon as that found its way into the Government coffers he became a tax dodger. That is one of the mildest terms applied to him to-day.

The trouble about legislation to-day is that it looks too much to the relief of some temporary inconvenience and too little to the permanent effect on our institutions. Excessive bond issues will gradually be self-corrective. The increased taxes resulting therefrom, the scandals frequently connected with their use, gradually build up a public spirit against them. The American public may be misled for a time, but their sober second thought can almost invariably be trusted.

But an amendment to the Constitution counter to its whole theory of distribution of powers is not so easy to correct and the mischief springing from it reaches far beyond the special occasion which prompted it.

An amendment which originates in Congress and not in the State legislatures places the primary responsibility on Congress, which represents the Nation in such case and is intended as a balance upon the State legislatures. It evades its own responsibility when it passes the amendment along to the State legislatures under the hope that they will assume the onus of voting it down. I sincerely hope that they will reject a proposition so fraught with peril.

Yours truly,

ROBT. M. HUGHES.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], who is absent on account of sickness, I ask permission to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 1929, a private pension bill upon which no report has been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, on behalf of his colleague [Mr. SCHALL], asks unanimous consent to withdraw the papers in the case described. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE PADGETT.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, January 21, be set apart for the holding of memorial exercises in honor of our deceased colleague, the late Hon. LEMUEL C. PADGETT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that January 21 be set apart for memorial exercises in memory of the late Mr. PADGETT. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On December 28, 1922:

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution extending the provisions of the act of February 25, 1919, allowing credit for military service during the war with Germany in homestead entries, and of Public Resolution No. 29, approved February 14, 1920, allowing a preferred right of entry for at least 60 days after the date of opening in connection with lands opened or restored to entry, to citizens of the United States who served with the allied armies during the World War.

On January 3, 1923:

H. R. 13180. An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13232. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

ANNUAL REPORT OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN (H. DOC. NO. 525).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a communication from the Alien Property Custodian, submitting his annual report of the proceedings had under the trading with the enemy act for the year ended December 31, 1922.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1923.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION, 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill. Before that motion is put I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if we can agree on time for general debate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Mr. MADDEN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have very few requests. I am disposed to agree to almost anything that the gentleman suggests in that regard.

Mr. MADDEN. Would three-quarters of an hour on each side be agreeable to the gentleman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate continue for not exceeding one hour and a half, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to an hour and a half, half the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MADDEN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13615) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. MCARTHUR in the chair.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Budget estimates upon which the bill is based were submitted by the President in House Documents Nos. 388, 390, 487–493, 495–497, 500–504, 506–508, 510, and 517 of the present Congress, aggregating $74,882,191.23. In addition to this sum the committee considered items for the House of Representatives not formally submitted through the Budget Bureau, totaling $26,625. These two sums make the aggregate of requests considered by the committee in connection with this bill of $74,908,816.23.

The amount recommended to be appropriated in the bill is $74,645,674.06, of which $51,025 is for the legislative branch, leaving $74,594,694.06 for the executive and judicial branches of the Government.

The amount recommended in the bill is $263,142.17 less than the total amount requested. This decrease was effected by the elimination or curtailment of the amounts requested for the following purposes:

Botanic Garden, 1923	$15,000.00
Federal Narcotic Board, 1923	800.00
Tariff Commission, 1923	100,000.00
Supreme Court, 1923 and 1924	900.00
Books for judicial officers, 1923	7,500.00
Payment of rewards, Postal Service, 1921	9,750.00
International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, 1923	8,500.00
Arlington Memorial Amphitheater, roof repairs, 1923	35,000.00
War Department, damage claims, 1922	85,692.17

The total recommended in the bill divides itself logically into two classes of items, namely, (a) appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1922 and prior fiscal years for obligations already incurred, and (b) supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 for purposes for which no appropriation was made and rendered necessary because of the enactment of new law or the arising of a situation which could not be foreseen when the regular bills were enacted, or for supplementing existing appropriations for 1923 due to the enactment of new law or the arising of a situation unforeseen when the original appropriation was made. A division of the total amount in the bill ($74,645,674.06) on the basis of the foregoing classification is as follows:

(a) Fiscal year 1922 and prior years	$46,391,723.87
(b) Fiscal year 1923	28,253,950.19

The total of $46,391,723.87 for the fiscal year 1922 and prior fiscal years is composed of the following items:

Refunding taxes illegally collected, internal revenue	$42,430,000.00
Zoo Park, payment for land under court award through condemnation	3,096.34
United States courts and support of United States prisoners	562,278.95
Payment of rewards, Postal Service	7,750.00
Compensation of postmasters	1,399,508.03
Special delivery fees, Postal Service	780.05
State Department, international obligations in accordance with treaties and relief and protection of American seamen in accordance with provisions of law	58,468.81
Judgments rendered against the United States by United States courts and the Court of Claims	662,392.33
Claims audited and allowed by the General Accounting Office	1,267,449.36

Aside from the amount in the foregoing list for refunding taxes, the items represent actual deficiencies incurred in 1922 and prior years and for which no payment has been made.

The amount of $42,430,000 for refunding taxes illegally collected for the fiscal years 1920 and 1922 represents, in part, actual claims approved and awaiting payment and in part is in anticipation of the amount which will be approved for payment from among the claims already filed and awaiting audit and adjustment. Approximately $17,000,000, involving 15,583 claims, has been approved and awaits payment from this appropriation. The remainder of the amount recommended is for payment of claims which it is anticipated will be approved during the remainder of this fiscal year. The number of claims now pending is approximately 83,000, with an aggregate amount claimed of about $250,000,000.

While the amounts required for the repayment of taxes illegally collected are large and arise from the collections of fiscal years when the tax receipts were unusually heavy, it must be kept in mind that the Government is recovering approximately $25,000,000 per month as the result of audits and investigations from schedules where underpayments have been made. The following table will prove of interest to the House in connection with the consideration of this appropriation:

Total internal-revenue receipts, total amount of additional assessments due to office audits and field investigations, and total amount of refunds of taxes illegally collected, by fiscal years 1917 to 1922, inclusive.

Year.	Total internal revenue receipts.	Amount of additional assessments and collections resulting from office audits and field investigations.	Amounts of refunds of taxes illegally collected.
1917	$809,393,640.44	$16,597,255.00	$887,127.94
1918	3,698,955,820.93	29,984,655.00	2,088,565.46
1919	3,850,150,078.56	123,275,768.00	8,654,171.21
1920	5,407,580,251.81	466,889,359.00	14,127,098.00
1921	4,595,000,765.74	416,483,708.00	28,656,357.95
1922	3,197,451,083.00	266,978,873.00	48,134,127.83

The foregoing statement shows an aggregate of receipts for the years named of $21,558,531,640.48. It also shows that during those years there was assessed and collected, as the result of office and field audits and investigations, $1,320,209,618. Contrasted to this latter sum there was refunded to taxpayers for the period named, because of overpayments, the sum of $102,547,448.39.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question here?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to finish this statement, and then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The amount assessed and collected from back taxes during the first quarter of the fiscal year 1923 is approximately $78,000,000, and if this rate is maintained the estimated collection of $300,000,000 of back taxes during the fiscal year 1923 will be realized. The estimate for the fiscal year 1924 is that $200,000,000 will be received from this source.

The total of $28,253,950.19 for the fiscal year 1923 is composed of the following items:

Cooperative construction of rural post roads	$25,000,000.00
United States marshals and deputy marshals	2,000,000.00
Tariff Commission	150,000.00
Regulation of entry of pink bollworm	75,000.00
Motor boat, Alaska forest service	8,500.00
Salaries of additional judges	81,000.00
United States penitentiaries	105,267.28
Cape Spartel Light, maintenance	96.50
Payments to Chinese Government	5,913.79
Lighthouse Service, damage claims	653.16
Navy Department, damage claims	6,969.46
Supreme Court reports	525.00
Sites for military purposes	769,000.00
House of Representatives	26,625.00
Botanic Garden	24,400.00

The item of $25,000,000 for the cooperative construction of rural post roads is one-half of the authorization of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923 in accordance with paragraph 1, section 4, of the Post Office appropriation act approved June 19, 1922. Under that authorization and the apportionment thereof by the Secretary of Agriculture approximately $16,700,000 has been obligated to December 20 last to 33 different States, and only 3 States have submitted vouchers to draw against 1923 money.

The committee carries in this bill the provision recommended by the Bureau of the Budget and approved by the Department of Agriculture, preventing the lapse of such part of the 1923 authorization as may not be absorbed during the fiscal year 1923, and making the appropriations heretofore and hereafter granted for road construction available for the payment of any maturing obligations under the authorized programs. This procedure will not in any manner affect or prejudice the allotment justly due to any State and will greatly reduce the Treasury balance, heretofore unnecessarily large because past appropriations have been made often far in advance of the time when funds were needed to pay for the accomplished work. On December 1, 1922, the unexpended cash balance in the Treasury was $139,000,000. The cash balance on hand plus the appropriations carried in the pending Agricultural appropriation bill and in this bill will be more than sufficient to pay all maturing obligations presented prior to December 31, 1923, and are reasonably certain to care for all necessities up to June 30, 1924.

The appropriation of $2,000,000 represents a deficiency in the appropriation for "Salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies." This sum is due entirely to the employment of deputy marshals during the recent railroad strikes and for the payment of such expenses as were incident to their employment.

The appropriation of $150,000 for the Tariff Commission is recommended to enable that body to perform the duties placed upon it by the tariff act of September 22, 1922.

The item of $75,000 for the regulation of the entry into the United States of the pink bollworm of cotton is occasioned by the destruction by fire of the fumigating house, equipment, and supplies at Laredo, Tex. The amount recommended is for the replacement of these facilities in order that the work may not be unduly hampered.

The appropriation of $81,000 for salaries of judges is composed of $6,000 for an additional circuit judge for the Territory of Hawaii, as authorized by law, and of $75,000 for the compensation during the remainder of this fiscal year of such of the additional district judges authorized by the act of September 14, 1922, as may be appointed and qualified prior to July 1, 1923.

The appropriation of $769,000 for sites for military purposes is carried pursuant to law in the same amounts and for the same projects as are specifically authorized in the act of September 22, 1922.

An appropriation of $5,913.79 is recommended for payment to the Chinese Government as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States in satisfaction of claims arising out of the negligent or unlawful acts in China of persons connected with the military and naval services of the United States. The communication from the President transmitting the estimate indicates that the failure of the United States to pay these amounts is embarrassing the Department of State in its endeavors to press for settlement the claims of American creditors against the Chinese Government.

In connection with the item for the refund of illegally collected taxes, I may say that I think it is a remarkable showing that as the result of the audit so far made we have collected $1,320,000,000 on underpaid schedules, while the Government has only paid out $102,000,000 as the result of overpaid schedules.

The question has been asked frequently in the House whether there is any chance for collusion between people who are filing claims and pressing them and those in the Treasury Department. The committee applied itself to that question as fully as it could. We went carefully into the question of how these claims are audited, how they are adjudicated, the persons to whom they must go before final settlement, and we find that when a schedule is filed for overpayment the claim comes through the collector of the district in which the taxpayer lives. Then it comes to the Treasury Department and goes into the Bureau of Accounts. There it is given a number and then sent to the auditing section, where there are a great many auditors, in groups of 15 auditors each.

The schedules are sent to one auditor in a group without anybody knowing what schedule he will get. He never knows what schedule is coming to him. When he gets through the audit, makes up the balance of the amount to be paid, the schedule is sent back to the supervisory officer of the section in which this group of 15 auditors work. The supervising officer then reads the evidence, reads the conclusions, reads the determination, reads the law, reads the facts, and he may revise or he may reject or he may approve. When he gets through, that schedule is sent back to the accounting section, and from there it is sent to a board of review which consists of 15 men, 10 sitting on one board and 5 on another.

This board of review hears all the evidence in the case on which the audit was made and conclusion reached, and after they get through reading and looking up the law, examining all the facts, reviewing the conclusions reached by the auditing and supervising officers of the auditing section, they may send the whole thing back or they may approve. On all items for refund in excess of $50,000 they have the final right to adjudicate. If the amount involved is in excess of $50,000, it goes to the solicitor of the department, and there the solicitor with his corps of lawyers and assistants review everything that has been done by the board below, including the facts and the law, and decide the question finally.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. In your investigations did you find out whether or not former employees of this department of the Government who had resigned and accepted positions with outside firms had been active and at least very influential in getting certain claims expedited for the refund of taxes?

Mr. MADDEN. No; we did not do that, but we did do this: We did find that while any person might be able to expedite a claim—that is, get it considered more promptly—nobody was able to influence the conclusion reached, not even the man who made the first audit, for he did not know when he was auditing one claim what claim would come next. He never knew what claim would come to his desk. When it went to somebody else, they did not know where the claim was going. The man above did not know what was coming to him. It had to go through five separate hands, each one of whom could approve, disapprove, send back, or revise. I do not believe there is any chance of collusion anywhere.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not raising the question as to the validity and justice of these claims. The point I am raising is it has been charged that men in this department, regardless of political affiliations, owing to the advantageous position which they held, acquired information that was very valuable in connection with these matters and are in a position to pass that information on to some one on the outside who can get himself in touch so that he can have his claim expedited, and that citizens who have been held up for months and perhaps two or three years, kept out of their money, could not get relief.

Mr. MADDEN. We did not go into that. I do not think we could have gone into that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have been much interested in the statement on page 4 of the report of the committee which says:

> On December 1, 1922, the unexpended cash balance in the Treasury was $139,000,000. The cash balance on hand plus the appropriations carried in the pending Agricultural appropriation bill and in this bill will be more than sufficient to pay all maturing obligations contracted prior to December 31, 1923, and are reasonably certain to pay for all necessities up to June 30, 1924.

That is a very gratifying statement if the chairman is positive that the assurance is given, and I would like in view of the recent statement made by the President of the United States that it was likely we would have a deficit in the next fiscal year of at least $650,000,000 to have him give us a little further assurance.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say in answer to the gentleman that the committee went very carefully into the road question. We originated a plan to see if we could not obviate the possibility of trouble between the States and the Agricultural Department in the matter of getting money for the roads. The gentleman will recollect that in the past allotments were made out of appropriations for each of the States under the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I fear the gentleman misapprehends my inquiry. I do not ask with reference to the road question. The gentleman's statement as I gather it from the report is that the balance, representing the whole Treasury—that there will be no deficit in the year 1924. A short time ago the President said that there would be a deficit of at least $650,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill does not deal with that. The balance the gentleman has referred to deals with roads entirely. But let me answer the question the gentleman does ask as far as I am able to do it. The indicated deficit for the beginning of the fiscal year 1923 was $674,000,000. The evidence we have before us now shows that that deficit has been worked down definitely to $272,000,000. It is clear and almost definitely certain that by the end of the fiscal year we will work it all out so that there will be no deficit at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And that is an actual working out and not a bookkeeping statement?

Mr. MADDEN. It is an actual working out. At the beginning of the fiscal year 1922 the indicated deficit was $759,000,000. At the close of the fiscal year 1922 we showed an actual surplus of $313,000,000, and all the evidence points to the fact that for 1924 we will have a clear surplus of $181,000,000 at the beginning of the fiscal year. But assuming that the $272,000,000 should not be worked out, the surplus for 1923 and the surplus for 1924—$313,000,000 and $181,000,000, making an aggregate of $500,000,000, from which should be deducted the $272,000,000—would leave $220,000,000 surplus for the three-year period.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, of course the surplus he speaks of is a mere bookkeeping balance necessary to be kept in the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. The $313,000,000 I refer to was used to take up obligations against the Government.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that, but you have to keep a certain amount, say, two or three hundred million dollars, as a working balance in the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And you can call that a surplus or whatever you want to, but how is the gentleman going to work out this $273,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. By the introduction of economies in the administration of the departments of the Government.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman mind enumerating?

Mr. MADDEN. I could not go into the details.

Mr. GARNER. The details would be very interesting. The gentleman is one of the men who prepared and helped to pass through this House what is known as the Budget law. He will recall the arguments made before the committee with reference to the responsibility to be placed upon the Executive in respect to his duty to report to Congress deficits and to suggest to Congress methods by which those deficits might be met. The President comes to Congress with his first Budget message, as I recall it, under the law——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And he tells the Congress there is $273,000,000 of deficit, but he does not recommend one single method by which you shall meet it; but, like the gentleman from Illinois, he says, "We expect to work it out."

Mr. MADDEN. They did work it out.

Mr. GARNER. By economies, they say; but they do not go into detail.

Mr. MADDEN. They did work it out. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who has been wanting me to yield for some time.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to recur to the question of the refunding of taxes. The gentleman has told of the process of these returns through the department.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Specifically what I want to know is this: Why is it, after this process has all been gone through, after claims have been audited and passed and settlements made, that the claims are then sent into the field again for further audit?

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman. In the first place, as soon as a settlement is made, the very first thing done is to send the schedule with the settlement to the collector of the district in which the taxpayer lives for the purpose of permitting the collector to ascertain whether the taxpayer owes the Government any money. If he owes the Government, the amount of the settlement is applied to the payment of what he owes instead of being paid him in cash. If the research made by the collector of the district shows that he does not owe any money, that schedule is sent back to the bookkeeping and warrants and accounts bureau of the Treasury, and a voucher is made, upon which payment follows.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As a matter of fact they pay to the taxpayer here, refund to him, and the taxpayer assumes that the matter is closed, and then the return is sent into the field.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Absolutely; I can say that from personal experience. I can testify that that is true.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman knows the facts better than we do who have investigated them, well and good, but I am telling the gentleman the process through which the matter goes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And I am telling the gentleman what has happened in specific cases.

Mr. MADDEN. We can not control that. I simply want to say, in connection with this refund of taxes, that this $42,000,000 which we propose now is to pay the $17,000,000 on which claims have already been audited and allowed and to pay any claims between now and the 1st of July that may be audited and allowed for the fiscal year 1920 and prior years. For 1921 there is a balance of $8,900,000 out of which payment can be made on schedules audited for 1921. For 1922 they have a balance of $1,300,000 which can be used to pay on schedules audited for 1922, and they have a balance of about $3,350,000 for 1923 from which payments can be made. Most of the schedules that are being audited to-day are for the fiscal years 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and particularly for 1917, and the reason why they are making a drive on 1917 is that the statute of limitations runs out on the 1st of March and they want to get all of these claims audited before that time, and after that they will have established beyond any question the policy under which audits and allowances will follow. The great problem the department has had to deal with is, first, to establish a foundation, a policy, for example, as to what may be allowed in depreciation of inventories, what would be allowed in the matter of expenses, what would be allowed in the matter of depreciation in property in case of coal mines and oil wells, and all that sort of thing; and when they get through with this and wish an audit on these great fundamental questions there will not be much money involved in the return on overpaid schedules, because the policy will have been definitely and decisively established.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an article by Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, on tax-exempt securities.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include therein an article by Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, on tax-exempt securities.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, December 31, 1922.]

MENACING FLOOD OF TAX-FREE BONDS—TOTALS $30,000,000,000—ESCAPE OF THE WEALTHY FROM JUST INCOME PAYMENTS—MANY GROSS INEQUALITIES—COLUMBIA ECONOMIST PRESENTS FACTS IN FAVOR OF HARDING'S PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

(By Edwin R. A. Seligman, Ph. D., LL. D., McVickar professor of political economy, Columbia University.)

The recommendation of the President in his message to Congress, also found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that we should end the further issue of tax-exempt bonds by an amendment to the Constitution brings the matter to the forefront of public discussion. As there seems to be much misunderstanding of the topic, it may be wise to discuss it under five separate heads:

1. What is the reason for tax exemption?
2. What are the facts?
3. What are the objections to tax exemptions?
4. What are the alleged advantages?
5. What is the solution of the problem?

I.

WHY DO WE HAVE TAX EXEMPTIONS?

Exemptions from taxation are as old as taxation itself. In their origin they undoubtedly played a useful rôle. Thus, in medieval times, a man was subject to a scutage, or "shield money"; but if he went to war and provided his own horse and armor in the feudal array he was exempt from the tax. Exemptions were accorded for public rather than private reasons. Even to-day—not to speak of growing crops and workingmen's tools—ministers' houses, cemeteries, educational and religious institutions are exempt from taxation. The public at large is willing to bear the higher rate of taxation because the exempted classes or institutions are really performing a function which the Government would otherwise be called upon to assume.

EXEMPTION DEGENERATED.

The original system of class exemption, however, soon degenerated. In some cases exemption was acquired by classes which enjoyed political power without assuming political responsibility, as notably in France under the ancient régime. In other cases the exemption became individual in character, finally culminating in a system whereby anyone could buy himself free of taxation.

As a result of the French Revolution and modern democracy, individual exemptions have almost everywhere been abolished and the class exemptions have been reduced to the narrowest limits. One of these class exemptions which still persists is that with which we have to deal at present, namely, the exemption of Government bonds.

WAR AS AN EXCUSE.

The first obvious reason which led to the exemption of Government bonds from taxation was war. At the outbreak of war Government credit is apt to weaken, and yet it is precisely at this moment that the need for revenues is greatest. What is more natural, then, than that the Government should seek to strengthen its credit—that is, to sell its bonds at a higher price or at a lower interest rate, by granting to the holders an exemption from taxation?

The argument originally applied in times of war was soon extended to times of peace. If exemption of Government bonds in war means a strengthening of public credit and an increased facility for the marketing of a loan, there seemed to be no reason why governments should not avail themselves of the same advantage in normal times. This was especially true of the State and local governments in the United States, with their desire to borrow money for productive expenditures for good roads and more schools, instead of the unproductive expenditures of war. The advocates of tax exemption found a ready defense in the argument that the lower rate of interest would mean a reduced cost of the enterprise and a consequent diminution of the burden on the taxpayers, who would ultimately have to meet the loan.

COURT DECISION.

As the result of a long and interesting development in the judicial construction of the Constitution, it has been decided that the bonds of the National Government are not subject to tax by the States, and that the bonds of the State and local governments are not subject to tax by the Federal Government. Here, therefore, we have a remarkable situation. The Federal Government surely has received no benefits from the issue of State and local securities; nor have the State and local governments derived any peculiar benefits from the issue of the national securities. Yet both kinds of government are inhibited by constitutional interpretation from taxing their own citizens who happen to possess securities issued by the other class of government.

HANDS OF STATES NOW TIED.

Whatever the Federal Government might decide to do about its own bonds—and it is quite conceivable that for reasons of weight, as we shall see, the Federal Government might like to tax its own bonds—it is prevented from applying the same method to the State and local bonds; vice versa, the State and local governments which might decide to tax their own securities would be prevented from taxing the bonds of the Federal Government in the possession of their own citizens. The fact that the hands of each class of government are tied in dealing with the securities of the other class of government would thus prevent them from attempting a reform—if a reform seemed desirable—with their own securities.

II.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

Bearing in mind, then, the peculiar character of our American problem, let us consider the facts.

When we entered the war the Government was much disturbed at the outlook. Although the credit was good, the necessity of marketing such an unheard-of quantity of bonds created a delicate situation. Secretary McAdoo was exceedingly anxious to issue the first Liberty loan at as low an interest rate as possible, and yet he was confronted by a market in which there were outstanding large quantities of State and local tax-exempt securities. Moreover, he was obsessed by the idea that Wall Street should not derive any special advantage from the emission, and he believed that a high interest rate would not only accomplish this result but would saddle an undue annual burden upon the country. He therefore decided, contrary to the advice of many economists and some of the leading financiers, to accord a complete tax exemption to the entire issue.

LIBERTY BONDS SUBJECT TO SURTAX.

The result of this maneuver was, however, not entirely satisfactory. When the succeeding issues of Liberty and Victory bonds were made the tax exemption was accordingly restricted, both in amount and in duration. In some cases a distinction was made between the normal tax and the surtax; in others the maximum amount of the exempt principal was fixed at $20,000, $30,000, or $45,000, and the time limit on the exemption was made from two to five years after the presidential proclamation of peace.

EXTENT OF EXEMPTIONS.

The net result was that of the total new debt of some $22,000,000,000 there was exempt from taxation in the hands of any individual not only the 3½ per cent bonds and the 3¾ per cent notes, but also on all the issues together a maximum of $160,000 if he had properly distributed his purchases among the various classes of obligations. Inasmuch as the richer investors had at their disposal not only this $160,000 but the entire amount of the 3½ per cent bonds and the 3¾ per cent notes, and in view of the fact that a not inconsiderable number of smaller investors were in the $160,000 class, it may be asserted with confidence that from the time of issue up to the present virtually the entire issue of Government war loans of about twenty-two and a half billions has been exempt from taxation. To this should be added almost a billion of pre-war bonds and some half billion of Government farm-loan bonds.

It must be remembered, however, that inasmuch as the presidential proclamation of peace did not come until June, 1921, the privilege of tax exemption on all the Government war loans, except the first, will automatically cease between 1923 and 1926. The tax exemption of Federal bonds must therefore be pronounced in large part an exemption of limited range, designed primarily for war purposes.

On the other hand, the exemption of the entire $23,000,000,000 from State and local taxation will continue, irrespective of the provisions of the Federal law.

STATE BONDS FREE OF SURTAX.

In the case of the State and local issues, however, the exemption is perpetual for all forms of tax, not alone for State and local but also for Federal taxes. The problem of State and local exemption, therefore, is really the more important one. This is all the more true because of the steady increase in the issue of such securities. Until the results of the new Federal census of wealth, debt, and taxation to be taken in 1923 become available we shall have no exact facts at our disposal. The last statistics are those of the census of 1913, and even these are not complete. We know how many bonds were outstanding at that time in States and counties and in incorporated places of over 30,000 and in civil divisions of less than 30,000, including drainage and irrigation districts, school districts, and the like. The exact figures are as follows:

States	$364,836,427
Counties	333,236,161
Local:
Over 30,000	2,489,665,185
3,000 to 30,000	316,695,185
2,500 to 3,000	232,023,319
Under 2,500	111,516,694
Other specified civil divisions	103,068,188

INCREASE IN STATE BONDS.

The latest official figures are those for 1919. For that year we have two census reports, one affecting States and the other affecting incorporated places of over 30,000. We find that in 1919 the bonds or funded debt of the States had risen from $364,000,000 in 1913 to $625,000,444, or almost double. We find that in the cities of 30,000 or over the outstanding bonds had risen from $2,489,000,000 to $3,904,000,000. Applying the same percentage of growth to the counties and civil divisions under 30,000, for which we have no figures, it would bring the tax-exempt securities outstanding in 1919 to a little under $6,000,000,000.

With reference to the bonds issued by the States and municipalities alone we are in a little better position owing to the records kept in Wall Street. The following table, taken from the Bondbuyer, discloses the amounts of bonds issued by the States and localities during the last 10 years:

	Long term.	Short term.	Total.
1912	$399,046,000	$192,450,000	$591,496,000
1913	408,478,000	483,218,000	891,696,000
1914	445,906,000	286,055,000	731,961,000
1915	492,590,000	154,278,000	647,318,000
1916	497,404,000	292,407,000	789,811,000
1917	444,933,000	392,444,000	837,377,000
1918	262,819,000	473,135,000	735,954,000
1919	770,195,000	450,094,000	1,220,289,000
1920	773,664,000	664,087,000	1,437,751,000
1921	1,304,289,000	716,104,000	2,020,393,000
1922 [1]	1,039,939,000	210,605,000	1,250,544,000

[1] Nine months.

From these tables two conclusions are apparent. The first is that since the adoption of the Federal war income taxes the issue of State and local securities has enormously increased, and that the rate of increase itself is growing from year to year. The second is that in addition to the $6,000,000,000 outstanding in 1919 we have had another $3,500,000,000 up to the end of this year. We can therefore confidently assert that there are now outstanding some $10,000,000,000 of State and local bonds, with an annual increase of from one to one and a half billions.

If this rate of increase is maintained, as seems likely, there will be outstanding by the end of 1926, when most of the Federal securities will lose their exemptions, from $14,000,000,000 to $17,000,000,000 of State and local securities, in addition to the several billions of Federal bonds and farm-loan bonds.

In other words, from 1919 to 1926 there will have been outstanding of tax-exempt bonds an amount ranging from $25,000,000,000 to $35,000,000,000, to be reduced in 1926, unless the Federal Government issues more tax-exempt bonds, to between $18,000,000,000 and $21,000,000,000. These are the outstanding facts of the situation. In other words, the average of tax-exempt bonds from the end of the war to 1926 is about $30,000,000,000, and the average for the period of the few years after 1926 will be about $20,000,000,000.

Making a liberal allowance for the bonds held by banks and corporations, we may safely assume that one-half of the entire issue is held by individuals with an income over $2,000. The National Bureau of Economic Research has confronted the proportion as over 57 per cent. What we have to deal with practically is therefore a tax exemption in the hands of individuals ranging between $15,000,000,000 up to 1926 and $10,000,000,000 after 1926, increasing thereafter by from one and a half to two billions.

III.

WHAT ARE THE DISADVANTAGES OF TAX EXEMPTION?

First and foremost, it is obvious that if outstanding bonds, Federal, State, and local, bear an interest rate of about 4½ per cent, it would mean that the income on an average of $15,000,000,000 would be about $675,000,000. The Federal Government alone will have lost up to 1926 not only the 8 per cent normal tax but also the surtax in so far as these securities are held by the richer individuals. If we assume that these bonds are so held that they are subject to an average tax of 40 per cent, we have a loss to the Federal Government of $270,000,000 a year, or 40 per cent of $675,000,000, which is the interest on $15,000,000,000. This makes no allowance for the 12½ per cent tax on the bonds held by corporations, which will bring the figure to at least $300,000,000.

M'ADOO MADE MISTAKE.

This loss of revenue far transcends any possible gain that might accrue to the Federal Government from the lower rate of interest on the tax-exempt bonds. From the point of view of revenue the issue of tax-exempt bonds has been a losing investment. Instead of being grateful to Secretary McAdoo for the alleged savings which he secured for the Government, we should censure him severely for the increased burden that he has imposed on the community as a whole.

HEAVY ANNUAL LOSS.

If we add to these figures for the Federal Government the sums lost by the separate States through inability to subject these securities to the State property or income taxes the loss of annual revenue becomes appalling.

More important, however, than the fiscal side of the problem is the economic and social side.

The second objection to tax exemption is that it creates a gross inequality of burden. To the extent that these bonds form an increased share of the realized property of the Nation, tax exemption means the liberation of unearned incomes at the expense of earned incomes. We may not be ready in this country for the principle which has been adopted almost everywhere else, namely, the principle of differentiation of taxation, whereby lower rates are granted to labor or earned incomes than to property or unearned incomes.

WE STAND ALONE.

But it is certainly true that no country has yet seen fit to tax property or unearned incomes at an actually lower rate than earned incomes. Yet that is what we are virtually doing.

In addition to this glaring inequality we have a still worse situation, namely, the escape of the rich man from the burden, which must accordingly be borne by the poor man and by the recipients of moderate incomes. The President has made us familiar with the facts of the situation. With the exceedingly high surtaxes in our present income tax, making the entire tax rise until recently to 77 per cent, and now to 58 per cent, the temptation on the part of the wealthy to invest in the tax-exempt bonds becomes irresistible. The result is a progressive falling off in the numbers and amounts of taxable incomes in the higher income scales. The following table from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made public a few days ago, clearly shows the tendency:

	Number of returns.		Net income.
	All classes.	Over $300,000.	All classes.	Over $300,000.
1916	437,036	1,296	$6,298,577,620	$992,972,983
1917	3,472,890	1,015	13,652,383,207	731,372,153
1918	4,425,114	627	15,924,639,355	401,107,868
1919	5,332,760	679	19,859,491,448	440,011,589
1920	7,259,944	395	23,735,629,183	246,354,585

"During the same period," says the Treasury report, "the investment income of all classes increased, while in incomes over $300,000 investment income shrank from $706,945,738 in 1916 to $229,052,039 in 1920. This indicates an astounding decline in taxable incomes over $300,000."

HOW THE PLAN WORKS.

While it is true, of course, that in a period of business depression incomes are apt to decrease, it is beyond peradventure of doubt that the prodigious falling off implies an immense investment in the tax-exempt securities.

Consider for a moment what this means. The development of modern democracy has brought about a demand for the wiping out of the old abuses of taxation, whereby the wealthy rolled the burden off on the masses. If America has stood for anything, it was the democratization of society and the conferring of equal opportunities upon all. We are the only country in the world which has raised so much of its war tax from wealth and not from consumption. Not a few even think we have gone too far in that direction.

AN UPSIDE-DOWN TAX.

Now we are confronted by a situation in which the wealthy gradually stand from under and make the less fortunate bear the burden. The existence of the tax-exempt securities is honey-combing our entire system of taxation; it is upsetting the system of graduated taxation which we thought we had adopted; it is converting it into its opposite, a degressive tax, or what the French call an "upside-down progressive tax." We are quickly getting back to the system of the Middle Ages, with its noble principle of le fort portant le faible, "the strong bearing the burden of the weak," but which in practice was turned into the opposite principle, of the weak bearing the burdens of the strong.

What a travesty on justice! What an absurdity for a country like the United States! How can we expect social peace and class contentment with such a glaring inequality of taxation? What wonder that we should have a radical "bloc"!

FAVORS CERTAIN INVESTMENTS.

Tax exemption, in the third place, gives an unfair advantage to certain forms of investment, and for that reason disturbs and even imperils general industry. Tax exemption puts Government bonds into a preferred condition and artificially restricts the market for other bonds. Thus large lenders of mortgage bonds tell us that since these large issues of State and local tax-exempt bonds the market for farm mortgages has become less attractive, with the result that the farmer has to pay a higher interest rate.

ENCOURAGING EXTRAVAGANCE.

The fourth objection to the issuance of State and local tax-exempt bonds is that they encourage extravagant expenditure.

The fifth objection to the system of tax exemption is that it prevents reduction of our tax burden. We have not, indeed, suffered to the extent of England, not to speak of France and Italy. It has been claimed that England is even now burdening her social income to such an extent as actually to trench on her social capital. Nevertheless, with us the cry for a reduction of the tax burden is widespread. Yet, with our present tax exemptions, that prospect must be deferred to the Kalends. Nothing would tend more to a diminution of our tax burdens than to put an end to these tax exemptions. A small normal income tax and a moderate surtax would then suffice for all our needs.

ENDANGERS PUBLIC REVENUE.

The sixth objection to the system of tax exemptions, especially State and local tax exemptions, is that it is endangering the entire system of Federal revenues. We all remember with dismay the fiscal system of our Government before the adoption of the present Constitution, when the Federal Government had to depend entirely on largesses, called requisitions, from the separate States. As the outstanding and tangible wealth comes more and more to consist of securities issued by State and local governments the basis of the Federal income tax—our chief source of reliance, present and prospective—will continually contract. More and more we shall be compelled to resort to an undesirable system of indirect taxes, or taxes on consumption, while with the growing and imperious needs of the Federal Government we may be compelled to depend again in large measure on the largesses of the States. Such a prospect is uninviting, to say the least.

IV.

WHAT ARE THE ALLEGED ADVANTAGES OF TAX EXEMPTION?

It is sometimes urged that the objections alluded to in the foregoing section are exaggerated, and that the shortcomings of the system of exemptions are by no means so glaring as depicted. One of the criticisms sometimes advanced is that the inequality of taxation is more fanciful than real, for the reason that the purchaser of the tax-exempt bonds has to pay so much more for the bond. He loses, it is alleged, in the premium which he has to pay for the bond, and this loss offsets any advantage supposed to accrue to him from tax exemption.

To a certain extent there is some truth in this, but only to a limited extent. There is undoubtedly what is known as the capitalization or amortization of taxation. If a particular bond or class of bonds, hitherto subject to tax with all others of the same class, is suddenly exempted, the market price will rise to an amount equal to the capitalization of the tax. Let us suppose that the market rate of interest is 4 per cent, and that 5 per cent bonds, subject to 1 per cent tax, sell at par. That is, if I own a $100 bond bearing 5 per cent interest and pay $1 tax, the net return is $4 and the bond will sell at par. If now one bond is exempted from the tax so that the net return is $5, the market value of the bond will, of course, rise proportionately, so as to keep the bond on a net 4 per cent income basis. The conclusion seems to be that it makes no difference to the new purchaser whether the bond is taxable or tax exempt. In either case he will make only $4 net.

A SCARCITY PRIVILEGE.

The fallacy of this argument is due to the fact that it neglects a consideration of the market conditions. It is true that if one bond is now exempt from tax, its market value will rise by the full capitalization of the tax. But in proportion as the privilege of tax exemption is accorded to another bond, then to another, and then to an entire class, the advantage of the privilege tends to diminish.

In other words, as the market tends to broaden, the conditions will change. Tax exemption through capitalization is a scarcity privilege. If all securities were exempt the privilege would disappear and there would be no difference in price. With every billion of dollars added to the amount of tax-exempt securities the advantage becomes smaller. But in proportion as the advantage of exemption diminishes the premium on the tax-exempt bonds will fall. Yet the advantage of remission from taxation remains unimpaired.

ACCRUING BENEFITS TO WEALTHY.

In other words, where the amount of tax-exempt securities is expanded by billions, as in this country at present, the benefits of tax exemption accruing to the wealthy increase. They will have to pay in the shape of premium a continually diminishing sum, and yet they will enjoy the same remission of tax. The disparity in market price between tax-exempt bonds and the taxables tends to efface itself; the disparity in the tax tends to remain the same.

PROGRESSIVE TAX DEFEATED.

Another and still more important consideration is neglected by those who claim that our criticism is unfounded. This is due to our graduated or progressive income tax. The reason why there is such a phenomenon as the capitalization of taxes, the reason why we have a premium on the market value of tax-exempt bonds, is that the market discounts the tax that has to be paid in future. Where we have a stable income tax, levied at a normal rate, as our present 8 per cent normal tax, it may be argued that the future purchaser, with his eyes open, will make allowance for this 8 per cent. But how about the high surtaxes? The bond may get into the hands of the man subject to the 50 per cent surtax; but it may also get into the hands of the small investor subject only to the 8 per cent normal tax.

RICH AVOID SURTAX.

Would it be reasonable to say the premium will amount to the capitalization of the 50 per cent rate? Under the condition at present, with the demand for tax-exempt bonds on the part of the small and modest investor as well, that position is assuredly untenable. The exact amount of the capitalization will depend upon the relative supply and the demand. Under actual conditions it is safe to say that probably only a little more than the normal tax is capitalized. Inasmuch as so little of the surtax is capitalized, the wealthy investor will pay a slight premium, but will enjoy remission of taxation on the total 50 per cent of the income.

COMBINE TWO ARGUMENTS.

If we combine these two arguments—on the one hand the scarcity-value argument, and on the other the graduated, or progressive, tax argument—it will be seen that the wealthy investor in tax-exempt securities pays very little for the privilege, and that the objections arising from the inequality of taxation remain unaffected.
